

V. I. LENIN

FROM THE BOURGEOIS REVOLUTION TO THE PROLETARIAN REVOLUTION
(1917)

V • I • L E N I N

SELECTED WORKS

IN TWELVE VOLUMES

Translated from the Russian as issued by
THE MARX-ENGELS-LENIN INSTITUTE
Moscow, U.S.S.R.

V • I • LENIN

SELECTED WORKS

VOLUME VI

FROM THE BOURGEOIS REVOLUTION
TO THE PROLETARIAN REVOLUTION
(1917)

INTERNATIONAL PUBLISHERS

381 FOURTH AVENUE

NEW YORK

ALL RIGHTS RESERVED

First Published by
CO-OPERATIVE PUBLISHING SOCIETY OF FOREIGN WORKERS IN THE U.S.S.R.

PRINTED IN THE UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

Edited by
A. FINEBERG

CONTENTS

	Page
PREFACE	XV

PART I

THE FEBRUARY REVOLUTION AND ITS PROSPECTS

LETTERS FROM AFAR	3
First Letter. The First Stage of the First Revolution
FAREWELL LETTER TO THE SWISS WORKERS	13
THE TASKS OF THE PROLETARIAT IN THE PRESENT REVOLUTION
Theses	21
A DUAL POWER	27
LETTERS ON TACTICS	31
Preface	31
First Letter	32
THE TASKS OF THE PROLETARIAT IN OUR REVOLUTION. Draft
of a Platform for the Proletarian Party	45
The Class Character of the Revolution	45
The Foreign Policy of the New Government	46
A Peculiar Dual Power and Its Class Significance	47
The Specific Nature of the Tactics Which Follow from the Above	50
Revolutionary Defencism and Its Class Nature	52
How Can the War Be Ended?	54
The New Type of State Developing in Our Revolution	55
The Agrarian and the National Programmes	59

	Page
Nationalisation of the Banks and Capitalist Syndicates . .	61
The Situation Within the Socialist International	62
The Collapse of the Zimmerwald International—The Need for a Third International	69
A Scientifically Sound Name for Our Party, One That Will Help to Clarify Proletarian Class Consciousness . . .	72
 POLITICAL PARTIES IN RUSSIA AND THE TASKS OF THE PRO- LETARIAT	 77
 REPORT ON THE CURRENT SITUATION DELIVERED AT THE APRIL CONFERENCE OF THE R.S.D.L.P., MAY 7 (APRIL 24), 1917	 88

PART II

INTERNAL PARTY QUESTIONS

MATERIALS RELATING TO THE REVISION OF THE PARTY PRO- GRAMME	105
Preface to the Pamphlet Materials Relating to the Revision of the Party Programme	105
Draft Revision of the Theoretical, Political and Other Sec- tions of the Programme	106
Concerning the Comments of the Commission of the April All-Russian Conference	110
The Old and the New Texts of the Programme	111
 THE PROBLEM OF UNITING THE INTERNATIONALISTS	 125

PART III

THE PROLETARIAT AND THE PARTY ON THE ROAD TO OCTOBER
LESSONS OF THE CRISIS	129
THE "CRISIS OF POWER"	133
ON THE EVE	136

CONTENTS

ix
Page

CLASS COLLABORATION WITH CAPITAL, OR A CLASS WAR AGAINST CAPITAL?	137
RUIN IS THREATENING	140
INEVITABLE CATASTROPHE—UNLIMITED PROMISES	143
SPEECH ON THE WAR DELIVERED AT THE FIRST ALL-RUSSIAN CONGRESS OF SOVIETS OF WORKERS' AND SOLDIERS' DEPUTIES, JUNE 22 (9), 1917.	150
THE EIGHTEENTH OF JUNE	164
ON SLOGANS	167
CONSTITUTIONAL ILLUSIONS	175
LESSONS OF THE REVOLUTION	190
Postscript	204
TO THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF THE R.S.D.L.P.	205
COMPROMISES	208
THE BOLSHEVIKS MUST ASSUME POWER. A Letter to the Central Committee and to the Petrograd and Moscow Committees of the R.S.D.L.P.	215
MARNISM AND INSURRECTION. A Letter to the Central Committee of the R.S.D.L.P.	218
THE CRISIS HAS MATURED	224
FROM A PUBLICIST'S DIARY. The Mistakes of Our Party	233
THE AIMS OF THE REVOLUTION	240
The Fatal Danger of Compromise with the Capitalists	242
Power to the Soviets	242
Peace to the Nations	243
The Land to the Toilers	245
Measures Against Famine and Economic Ruin	245

	Page
Measures Against the Counter-Revolution of the Landlords and Capitalists	247
Peaceful Development of the Revolution	248
CAN THE BOLSHEVIKS RETAIN STATE POWER?	250
Postscript	291
A LETTER TO THE BOLSHEVIK COMRADES ATTENDING THE RE- GIONAL CONGRESS OF THE SOVIETS OF THE NORTHERN REGION	297
RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF THE R.S.D.L.P. (BOLSHEVIKS) ON OCTOBER 23 (10), 1917.	303
A LETTER TO THE COMRADES	304
Postscript	323
A LETTER TO THE MEMBERS OF THE BOLSHEVIK PARTY	325
A LETTER TO THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF THE R.S.D.L.P.	329
A LETTER TO THE MEMBERS OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE	334

PART IV

THE PARTY AND THE PEASANTRY ON THE ROAD TO OCTOBER

REPORT ON THE AGRARIAN QUESTION DELIVERED AT THE APRIL ALL-RUSSIAN CONFERENCE OF THE R.S.D.L.P., MAY 11 (APRIL 28), 1917	339
RESOLUTION ON THE AGRARIAN QUESTION ADOPTED BY THE APRIL ALL-RUSSIAN CONFERENCE OF THE R.S.D.L.P.	345
DRAFT RESOLUTION ON THE AGRARIAN QUESTION PROPOSED TO THE FIRST ALL-RUSSIAN CONGRESS OF PEASANTS' DE- PUTIES	349
SPEECH ON THE AGRARIAN QUESTION DELIVERED AT THE FIRST ALL-RUSSIAN CONGRESS OF PEASANTS' DEPUTIES, JUNE 4 (MAY 22), 1917	352

CONTENTS

xi

Page

ON THE NECESSITY OF FOUNDING AN AGRICULTURAL WORKERS' UNION IN RUSSIA	372
First Article	372
Second Article	374
HOW THE PEASANTS WERE DECEIVED—AND WHY.	377
PEASANTS AND WORKERS	380
POSTSCRIPT TO THE BOOK "THE AGRARIAN PROGRAMME OF SOCIAL-DEMOCRACY IN THE FIRST RUSSIAN REVOLUTION, 1905-07"	389
A NEW FRAUD PRACTISED ON THE PEASANTS BY THE SOCIALIST-REVOLUTIONARY PARTY	391

PART V

THE OCTOBER REVOLUTION AND ITS SIGNIFICANCE

THE SECOND ALL-RUSSIAN CONGRESS OF SOVIETS OF WORKERS' AND SOLDIERS' DEPUTIES, NOVEMBER 7-8 (OCTOBER 25-26), 1917	399
To the Workers, Soldiers and Peasants	399
Report on the Peace Question, November 8 (October 26), 1917.	400
Decree on Peace	401
Report on the Land Question, November 8 (October 26), 1917.	405
Decree on the Land	406
The Peasant Instructions on the Land	407
DRAFT STATUTES ON WORKERS' CONTROL	410
FROM THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF THE R.S.D.L.P. (BOLSHEVIKS) To Comrades Kamenev, Zinoviev, Ryazanov and Larin	412

	Page
FROM THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF THE R.S.D.L.P. (BOLSHEVIKS) To All Party Members and to All the Toiling Classes of Russia	413
TO THE POPULATION	418
SPEECH ON THE AGRARIAN QUESTION DELIVERED AT THE EXTRAORDINARY CONGRESS OF SOVIETS OF PEASANTS' DEPUTIES, NOVEMBER 27 (14), 1917. Press Report	421
DRAFT RESOLUTION SUBMITTED TO THE EXTRAORDINARY CONGRESS OF SOVIETS OF PEASANTS' DEPUTIES	423
AN ALLIANCE BETWEEN THE WORKERS AND THE TOILING AND EXPLOITED PEASANTS. A Letter to "Pravda"	425
SPEECH DELIVERED AT THE SECOND ALL-RUSSIAN CONGRESS OF PEASANTS' DEPUTIES, DECEMBER 15 (2), 1917	428
DRAFT OF A MANIFESTO TO THE PEASANTRY FROM THE SECOND ALL-RUSSIAN CONGRESS OF PEASANTS' DEPUTIES	431
SPEECH ON THE CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY AND ON THE ARREST OF THE MEMBERS OF THE CADET PARTY, DELIVERED TO THE ALL-RUSSIAN CENTRAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE AT ITS SESSION OF DECEMBER 14 (1), 1917. Extract from the Minutes	437
NOTE TO F. E. DZERZHINSKY	440
DRAFT DECREE ON THE SOCIALISATION OF THE NATIONAL ECONOMY	442
Draft Decree on the Nationalisation of the Banks and the Adoption of the Measures Necessitated Thereby . . .	442
DRAFT DECREE ON CONSUMERS' COMMUNES	445
THESES ON THE CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY	447
DRAFT DECLARATION OF THE RIGHTS OF THE TOILING AND EXPLOITED PEOPLE	452

CONTENTS

xiii
Page

THE DISSOLUTION OF THE CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY. Speech Delivered to the All-Russian Central Executive Committee, January 19 (6), 1918	455
DRAFT DECREE ON THE DISSOLUTION OF THE CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY	460
THE ELECTIONS TO THE CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY AND THE DICTATORSHIP OF THE PROLETARIAT	463
THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE REVOLUTION. Speech Delivered at the Sixth Extraordinary Congress of Soviets, November 6, 1918	486
THE FOURTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE OCTOBER REVOLUTION . .	500
OUR REVOLUTION. A propos of the Notes of N. Sukhanov . .	509
EXPLANATORY NOTES	513

PREFACE

THE writings and speeches of Lenin contained in Vol. VI of the Selected Works relate to the period from the February Revolution, which took place in the beginning of 1917, to the victory of the proletariat and the establishment of a Soviet government in Russia towards the end of that year. Four items relating to a later date are added: "The Elections to the Constituent Assembly and the Dictatorship of the Proletariat," "The Anniversary of the Revolution," "The Fourth Anniversary of the October Revolution" and "Our Revolution." These items are included in order that the reader may, within the scope of the present volume, obtain a finished picture of Lenin's theory of the proletarian revolution and his views on the October Revolution.

It was not always possible to include the more voluminous writings of Lenin relating to the period covered by the present volume, and they are accordingly replaced by smaller and more popular writings (for instance, the long article entitled "The Threatening Catastrophe and How to Fight It" is replaced by the comparatively short article entitled "The Aims of the Revolution"). An extremely important work of Lenin's "The State and Revolution," written in 1917 and published in 1918, is entirely omitted in this volume. In view of its close connection with Lenin's later writings on the subject of the state, bourgeois democracy and the dictatorship of the proletariat, it will be included in Vol. VII of the Selected Works.

The volume is provided with copious explanatory notes, which will help to give a background to the articles and speeches here reproduced. These are indicated by an asterisk (*) in the text, and the note in question can be found under the number in the explanatory notes corresponding to the number of the page on which it occurs. Where more than one note occur on a page, subsequent notes are indicated by two or more asterisks as the case may be. Footnotes are designated by superior figures (¹).

PART I

THE FEBRUARY REVOLUTION AND ITS PROSPECTS

LETTERS FROM AFAR *

FIRST LETTER

The First Stage of the First Revolution

THE first revolution engendered by the imperialist World War has broken out. This first revolution will assuredly not be the last.

To judge by the scanty information at the writer's disposal here in Switzerland, the first stage of this first revolution, the Russian revolution of March 14 (1),¹ 1917, is at an end. This first stage of our revolution will certainly not be the last.

How could this "miracle" have happened, that in a period of not more than eight days—the period mentioned by M. Milyukov in his boastful telegram to Russia's representatives abroad—there should have collapsed a monarchy that had maintained itself for centuries, and that in spite of everything managed to maintain itself throughout the tremendous national class conflicts of the three years 1905-07?

There are no miracles in nature and history. But every abrupt turn in history, and this applies to every revolution, presents such a wealth of material, unfolds such unexpected and specific combinations of the forms of struggle and the alignment of forces of the contestants, that to the lay mind there is much that must appear miraculous.

For the tsarist monarchy to have collapsed in a few days required the combination of a number of factors of world-historic importance. We shall mention the chief of them.

Without the tremendous class conflicts and without the revolutionary energy displayed by the Russian proletariat during the three years 1905-07, this second revolution could not possibly have been so rapid in the sense that its first phase was completed in a few days. The first revolution (1905) deeply ploughed the soil and uprooted age-old prejudices; it awakened millions of workers and tens of millions of peasants to political life and political struggle; it revealed all classes (and all the principal parties) of Russian society to each other and to the world in their true character; it laid bare the true alignment of their interests, their strength and their modes of action, their immediate and their ultimate aims. This first revolution, and the succeeding period of counter-revolution (1907-14), laid bare the very soul of the tsarist monarchy, brought it to the utmost limit, exposed the rottenness and infamy, the cynicism and dissoluteness of the tsar's entourage headed by that monster, Rasputin; it exposed the bestiality of the Romanov family, those pogrom-mongers, who had drenched Russia in the blood of Jews, workers and revolutionaries—those landlords, “first among peers,” who owned millions of acres of land and were ready to stoop to any brutality, to any crime—who were ready to ruin and destroy any number of citizens in order to preserve the “sacred rights of property” for themselves and their class.

¹ The dates are given according to New Style, those in parenthesis being the corresponding Old Style dates.—Ed. Eng. ed.

Without the Revolution of 1905-07 and the counter-revolution of 1907-14, that precise “self-determination” of all classes of the Russian people and of all the nations inhabiting Russia, that determination of the relation of these classes to each other and to the tsarist monarchy which manifested itself during the eight days of the February-March Revolution of 1917 would have been impossible. This eight-day revolution was “performed,” if we may express ourselves metaphorically, as though after a dozen major and minor rehearsals; the “actors” knew each other, their parts, their places, and the entire setting; they knew it in every detail, through and through, down to every more or less significant shade of political tendency and mode of action.

But, while the first great Revolution of 1905, which Messrs. Guchkov and Milyukov and their toadies condemned as a “great mutiny,” did lead after the lapse of a dozen years to the “brilliant,” the “glorious revolution” of 1917—as the Guchkovs and Milyukovs proclaimed it, because it has put them in power (for the time being)—it still required a great and all-powerful “producer,” who would be capable on the one hand of vastly accelerating the course of world history and, on the other, of engendering worldwide crises of unparalleled intensity—economic, political, national and international. Apart from an immense acceleration of the course of world history, it was also required that history should make particularly abrupt turns, in order that at one of these turns the filthy and bloodstained cart of the Romanov monarchy should be abruptly overturned.

This all-powerful “producer,” this powerful accelerator was the imperialist World War.

That it is a world war is now indisputable, for the United States and China are today already half-drawn into it, and will be fully drawn into it tomorrow.

It is now also indisputable that it is an imperialist war on both sides. Only the capitalists and their toadies, the social-patriots and social-chauvinists, can deny or gloss over this fact. Both the German and the Anglo-French bourgeoisie are waging the war for the plunder of foreign countries and the strangling of small nations, for financial supremacy over the world and the division and redivision of colonies, and in order to save the tottering capitalist regime by fooling and sowing dissension among the workers of the various countries.

It was objectively inevitable that the imperialist war should have immensely accelerated and have extremely intensified the class struggle of the proletariat against the bourgeoisie; it is objectively inevitable that it shall be transformed into a civil war between hostile classes.

This transformation was started by the February-March Revolution of 1917, the first stage of which was first of all marked by a joint blow at tsarism delivered by two forces: on the one hand, by the whole of bourgeois and landlord Russia, with its unwitting hangers-on and its conscious leaders, the British and French ambassadors and capitalists, and, on the other, by the Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies.

These three political camps, these three fundamental political forces—1) the tsarist monarchy, the head of the feudal landlords, of the old bureaucracy and military caste; 2) the Octobrist and Cadet Russia of the bourgeoisie and landlords, behind whom the petty bourgeoisie trailed; 3) the Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, which is seeking allies in the proletariat and the poor masses of the population—these three fundamental political forces became fully and clearly revealed even in the eight days of the "first stage" and even to an observer so remote from the scene of events and obliged to content himself with the meagre dispatches of foreign newspapers as the present writer.

But, before speaking of this in greater detail, I must return to that portion of my letter which is devoted to a factor of prime importance, namely, the imperialist World War. The belligerent powers, the belligerent groups of capitalists, of the "bosses" of the capitalist system, the slaveowners of the capitalist slave-system, are shackled by the war to each other with chains of iron. One bloody clot—that is the social and political life of the present period of history.

The Socialists who deserted to the side of the bourgeoisie upon the outbreak of the war, the Davids and Scheidemanns in Germany and the Plekhanovs, Potresovs, Gvozdevs in Russia, clamoured loud and long against the "illusions" of the revolutionaries, against the "illusions" of the Basle Manifesto,¹ against the "dream-farce" of transforming the imperialist war into a civil war. They went through the whole gamut of praises to the strength, tenacity and adaptability allegedly revealed by capitalism—they, who had aided the capitalists to "adapt," tame, fool and disunite the working classes of the various countries!

But "he who laughs last laughs best." The bourgeoisie have been unable to delay for long the revolutionary crisis engendered by the war. The crisis is maturing with irresistible force in every country, beginning with Germany, which, according to an observer who recently visited that country, is suffering "brilliantly organised starvation," and ending with England and France, where starvation is also looming, but where organisation is far less "brilliant."

¹ Regarding the Basle Manifesto, cf. Lenin's article "The Collapse of the Second International," Vol. V of the present edition.—Ed.

It was only natural that the revolutionary crisis should have broken out first in tsarist Russia, where disorganisation was most monstrous and the proletariat most revolutionary (not by virtue of any specific qualities, but because of the vivid traditions of 1905). Here the crisis was hastened by the series of severe defeats suffered by Russia and her allies. These defeats entirely disjoined the old machinery of government and the old order and roused against them the anger of all classes of the population; they incensed the army, wiped out a vast number of its old diehard-noble and rotten-bureaucratic commanding staff, and replaced it by a young, fresh commanding staff consisting principally of bourgeois and petty bourgeois.

But while the defeats in the war were a negative factor hastening the outbreak of the crisis, the connection of Anglo-French finance capital, of Anglo-French imperialism, with the Octobrist and Constitutional-Democratic capital of Russia was a factor that speeded the crisis.

This highly important aspect of the situation is, for obvious reasons, not mentioned by the Anglo-French press, but is maliciously emphasised by the Germans. We Marxists must face the truth soberly, and not allow ourselves to be confused either by the official lies, the sugary diplomatic and ministerial lies of the first group of imperialist belligerents, or by the sniggering and smirking of its financial and military rivals of the other belligerent group. The whole course of events in the February-March Revolution clearly shows that the British and French embassies with their agents and "connections," who had long been making desperate efforts to prevent "separate" agreements and a separate peace* between Nicholas II (who, let us hope and endeavour, will be the last) and Wilhelm II, directly strove to replace Nicholas Romanov.

Let us harbour no illusions.

The fact that the revolution succeeded so quickly and—at the first superficial glance—so "radically" is due to the fact that, as a result of a unique historical situation, absolutely dissimilar movements, absolutely heterogeneous class interests, absolutely contrary political and social tendencies have merged, and merged in a strikingly "harmonious" manner. There was the conspiracy of the Anglo-French imperialists, who impelled Milyukov, Guchkov and Co. to seize power for the purpose of continuing the imperialist war, for the purpose of conducting the war still more ferociously and obstinately, for the purpose of slaughtering fresh millions of Russian workers and peasants in order that the Guchkovs might obtain Constantinople, the French capitalists Syria, the British capitalists Mesopotamia, and so on. This on the one hand. On the other, there was a profound proletarian and mass popular movement of a revolutionary character (a movement of the entire poor population of town and country) for bread, for peace, for real freedom.

The revolutionary workers and soldiers have destroyed the infamous tsarist monarchy root and branch, neither elated nor embarrassed by the fact that at certain brief and exceptional historical junctures they were aided by the efforts of Buchanan,¹ Guchkov, Milyukov and Co., whose desire was simply to replace one monarch by another.

This was the true state of affairs. And this alone must be the view of a politician who does not fear the truth, who soberly weighs the balance of social forces in the revolution, who appraises every "given moment" not only from the point of view of its present, current peculiarities, but also from the point of view of the deeper-lying springs, the deeper interrelation of the interests of the proletariat and the bourgeoisie, both in Russia and throughout the world.

The workers and soldiers of Petrograd, like the workers and soldiers of the whole of Russia, self-sacrificingly fought the tsarist monarchy—for freedom, land for the peasants, and peace as against the imperialist slaughter. Anglo-French imperialist capital, in order to continue and intensify that slaughter, hatched court intrigues, conspired, incited and encouraged the Guchkovs and Milyukovs, and prepared to install a new, ready-made government, which did in fact seize power after the proletarian struggle had struck the first blows at tsarism.

¹ The British ambassador to Russia.—Ed. Eng. ed.

This government is not a fortuitous assemblage of persons.

They are the representatives of the new class that has risen to political power in Russia, the class of the capitalist landlords and the bourgeoisie, the class that for a long time has been ruling our country economically, and that during the Revolution of 1905-07, during the counter-revolutionary period of 1907-14, and especially during the period of the war of 1914-17, organised itself politically with extreme rapidity, taking into its hands the control of the local government bodies, of popular education, of conventions of every type, of the Duma, the War Industries Committees,* etc. This new class was already "nearly" in power in 1917, and therefore the first blows dealt at tsarism were sufficient to bring the latter to the ground and clear the way for the bourgeoisie. The imperialist war, which required an incredible exertion of energy, so accelerated the course of development of backward Russia that we have "at a single stroke" (or rather as it seemed, at a single stroke) caught up with Italy, England, and almost with France; we have obtained a "coalition," a "national" (i.e., adapted for carrying on the imperialist slaughter and for deceiving the people), a "parliamentary" government.

Side by side with this government, which as regards the present war is but the clerk of the billion-dollar "firm," England and France, there has arisen a new, unofficial, undeveloped and as yet comparatively weak workers' government, expressing the interests of the workers and of the poor section of the urban and rural population. This is the Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies in Petrograd.

Such is the actual political situation; and we must first endeavour to define it with the greatest possible objective precision, in order that Marxist tactics may be based upon a solid foundation, the only foundation upon which they can be based—the foundation of facts.

The tsarist monarchy has been smashed, but not finally destroyed.

The Octobrist-Cadet bourgeois government, which desires to fight the imperialist war "to a finish," is in reality the agent of the financial firm "England and France." It is obliged to promise the people the maximum of liberties and sops compatible with the maintenance of its power over the people and the possibility of continuing the imperialist slaughter.

The Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies is the embryo of a workers' government, the representative of the interests of the poor masses of the population, i.e., of nine-tenths of the population, and is striving for peace, bread and freedom.

The conflict of these three forces determines the situation as it exists at present, which is transitional from the first phase of the revolution to the second.

In order to conduct a real struggle against the tsarist monarchy and in order that freedom may be guaranteed in deed, and not merely in words, not merely in the promises of glib liberalism, it is necessary, not that the workers should support the new government, but that the government should "support" the workers! For the only guarantee of liberty and of the complete destruction of tsarism lies in arming the proletariat, in strengthening, extending and developing the role, significance, and power of the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies.

All the rest is mere phrases and lies, self-deception on the part of the politicians of the liberal and radical camp.

Help, or, at least, do not hinder the arming of the workers, and liberty in Russia will be invincible, the monarchy irrestorable, the republic secure.

Otherwise the people will have been fooled. Promises are cheap, promises cost nothing. It was with promises that every bourgeois politician in every bourgeois revolution fed the people and fooled the workers.

Our revolution is a bourgeois revolution and therefore the workers must support the bourgeoisie, declared the worthless politicians in the camp of the liquidators.

Our revolution is a bourgeois revolution, we Marxists declare; and therefore the workers must open the eyes of the people to the deception being practised by the bourgeois politicians; they must teach them not to trust in words, but to depend entirely on their own strength, on their own organisation, on their own unity, and on their own weapons.

The government of the Octobrists and Cadets, of the Guchkovs and Milyukovs could not give peace, bread and freedom, even if it sincerely desired.

It cannot give peace because it is a war government, a government for the continuation of the imperialist slaughter, a government of conquest, which so far has not uttered a single word in renunciation of the tsarist policy of seizing Armenia, Galicia, Turkey, of annexing Constantinople, of reconquering Poland, Courland, Livonia, etc. This government is bound hand and foot by Anglo-French imperialist capital. Russian capital is merely one branch of the world-wide "firm" which manipulates hundreds of billions of rubles and which is known as "England and France."

It cannot give bread because it is a bourgeois government. At best, it can give the people a "brilliantly organised starvation," as Germany did. But the people will not tolerate starvation. The people will learn, and probably very soon, that bread exists and can be obtained, but only by methods that do not respect the sanctity of capital and landownership.

It cannot give freedom because it is a government of landlords and capitalists, and fears the people.

We shall speak in another article of the tactical problems of our immediate attitude towards this government. We shall there point out the peculiarity of the present situation, which is a transition from the first stage of the revolution to the second, and we shall point out why the slogan, the "order of the day," at the present moment must be: Workers, you have displayed marvels of proletarian heroism, the heroism of the people, in the civil war against tsarism; you must display marvels of organisation, organisation of the proletariat and the people, in order to prepare for victory in the second stage of the revolution.

Confining ourselves for the present to an analysis of the class struggle and the interrelation of class forces at this stage of the revolution, we must ask: Who are the allies of the proletariat in this revolution?

It has two allies: first, the broad mass of the semi-proletarian, and partly also of the petty peasant population of Russia, who number scores of millions and constitute the overwhelming ma-majority of the population. For this great mass peace, bread, freedom and land are essential. It is inevitable that this mass will to a certain extent be under the influence of the bourgeoisie, particularly of the petty bourgeoisie, to which it is most akin in its condition of life, vacillating between the bourgeoisie and the proletariat. The cruel lessons of the war, which will be the more cruel the more vigorously the war is prosecuted by Guchkov, Lvov, Milyukov and Co., will inevitably urge this mass towards the proletariat, compel it to follow the proletariat. We must now take advantage of the freedom given by the new regime and of the existence of the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies to strive first of all to enlighten and organise this mass. Soviets of Peasants' Deputies, Soviets of Agricultural Workers—that is one of our most urgent tasks. In this connection our endeavour will be not only that the agricultural workers shall establish their own Soviets, but that the poor and propertyless peasants shall organise separately from the well-to-do peasants. The special tasks and special forms of organisation urgently needed at the present time will be dealt with in the next letter.

The second ally of the Russian proletariat is the proletariat of all the belligerent countries and of all countries in general. At present this ally is to a large degree repressed by the war; and the social-chauvinists in Europe who, like Plekhanov, Gvozdev and Potresov in Russia, have deserted to the bourgeoisie speak all too frequently in its name. But the liberation of the proletariat from their influence has progressed with every month of the imperialist war, and it is inevitable that the Russian revolution will immensely accelerate this process.

With these two allies, the proletariat of Russia, utilising the peculiarities of the present transition moment, can and will proceed, first, to achieve a democratic republic and the complete victory of the peasantry over the landlords, and then to socialism, which alone can give the war-weary peoples peace, bread and freedom.

March 20 (7), 1917

FAREWELL LETTER TO THE SWISS WORKERS *

COMRADES SWISS WORKERS,

Leaving Switzerland for Russia, in order to continue internationalist revolutionary work in our own country, we members of the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party united under the Central Committee (in distinction from another party bearing the same name but united under the Organisation Committee¹), wish to convey to you our fraternal greetings and expression of profound comradely gratitude for your comradely attitude to political emigrants.

While the avowed social-patriots and opportunists, the Swiss "Gruetlians," who, like the social-patriots of all countries, have deserted the camp of the proletariat for the camp of the bourgeoisie—while these people have openly called upon you to resist the pernicious influence of foreigners upon the Swiss labour movement; and while the disguised social-patriots and opportunists, who form the majority of the leaders of the Swiss Socialist Party, have been covertly pursuing a similar policy, we must declare that we have met with warm sympathy from the revolutionary Socialist workers of Switzerland, who hold internationalist views, and have derived much benefit from our comradely intercourse with them.

We have always been particularly careful in expressing our opinion on questions concerning the Swiss movement, acquaintance with which requires prolonged participation in the local movement. But those of us, not more than ten or fifteen in number, who were members of the Swiss Socialist Party regarded it as our duty steadfastly to assert our point of view, i.e., the point of view of the "Zimmerwald Left,"  on general and fundamental questions pertaining to the international Socialist movement and to offer vigorous resistance not only to the social-patriots but also to the line of the so-called "Centre," which includes R. Grimm, F. Schneider, Jacques Schmidt, and others in Switzerland; Kautsky, Haase and the Arbeitsgemeinschaft * in Germany; Longuet, Pressemane, and others in France; Snowden, Ramsay MacDonald and others in England; Turati, Treves and their friends in Italy; and the above-mentioned party headed by the "Organisation Committee" (Axelrod, Martov, Chkheidze, Skobelev, and others) in Russia.

¹ By another party bearing the same name is meant the Menshevik Party; the Organisation Committee was in fact its Central Committee.—Ed.

We worked hand in hand with the revolutionary Social-Democrats of Switzerland, partly grouped around Freie Jugend,¹ who formulated and circulated (in German and French) the motives for holding a referendum on the question of summoning a Party congress in April 1917, to take up the question of the Party's attitude towards the war; who at the convention of the Zurich Canton in Töss introduced the resolution of the youth and the "Lefts" on the question of the war; who in March 1917 issued and circulated in certain parts of French Switzerland a leaflet in German and French entitled Our Terms of Peace, etc.

We send our fraternal greetings to these comrades, with whom we worked hand in hand and shared a common point of view.

We had not, and have not, the slightest doubt that the imperialist government of England will under no circumstances permit the return to Russia of Russian internationalists who are irreconcilably opposed to the imperialist government of Guchkov-Milyukov and Co., and who are irreconcilably opposed to Russia's continuing the imperialist war.

In this connection we must say a few words regarding our understanding of the tasks of the Russian revolution. We deem this all the more necessary since, through the medium of the Swiss workers, we can and should address the German, French, and Italian workers, who speak the same languages as the population of Switzerland, which still enjoys the advantages of peace and of the greatest relative amount of political freedom.

¹ Free Youth—a magazine of the Socialist youth of Switzerland.—Ed.

We remain absolutely loyal to the declaration we made in the central organ of our Party, in No. 47 of Sotsial-Demokrat of October 26 (13), 1915,¹ published in Geneva. We there stated that should the revolution prove victorious in Russia, and a republican government come to power, a government desirous of continuing the imperialist war, a war in league with the imperialist bourgeoisie of England and France, a war for the seizure of Constantinople, Armenia, Galicia, etc., etc., we would resolutely oppose such a government, we would oppose "national defence" in such a war.

A contingency more or less of this kind has arisen. The new government of Russia, which conducted negotiations with the brother of Nicholas II for the restoration of the monarchy in Russia, and in which the important and key posts are occupied by the monarchists Lvov and Guchkov, is trying to deceive the Russian workers by means of the slogan "The Germans must overthrow Wilhelm" (correct, but why not add that the British, the Italians, etc., must do the same to their kings, and the Russians to their monarchists, Lvov and Guchkov?). With the help of this slogan and without publishing the imperialist predatory treaties concluded by the tsar with France, Great Britain, etc., and confirmed by the government of Guchkov-Milyukov-Kerensky, this government is trying to represent its imperialist war with Germany as a war of "defence" (i.e., as a just war, legitimate even from the point of view of the proletariat)—is trying to palm off a war on behalf of the piratical, imperialist, predatory aims of Russian, British and other capital as a "defence" of the Russian republic (which does not yet exist in Russia, and which the Lvovs and the Guchkovs have not even promised to establish).

If there is any truth in the latest telegraphic reports to the effect that the avowed Russian social-patriots (such as Plekhanov, Zasulich, Potresov, and others) have effected something like a rapprochement with the party of the "Centre," the party of the "Organisation Committee," the party of Chkheidze, Skobelev, etc., on the basis of the slogan "As long as the Germans do not overthrow Wilhelm, our war is a defensive war"—if this is true, then we shall redouble our energies in the fight against the party of Chkheidze, Skobelev, etc., a fight which we have always waged against this party in the past for its opportunist, vacillating, unstable political behaviour.

¹ See Lenin, "A Few Theses," Selected Works, Vol. V.—Ed.

Our slogan is—No support to the Guchkov-Milyukov government! Whoever says that such support is necessary in order to prevent the restoration of tsarism is deceiving the people. On the contrary, the Guchkov government has already conducted negotiations for the restoration of the monarchy in Russia. The arming and the organisation of the proletariat alone can prevent Guchkov and Co. from restoring the monarchy in Russia. Only the revolutionary proletariat of Russia and of the whole of Europe, which remains loyal to internationalism, can save humanity from the horrors of the imperialist war!

We do not close our eyes to the tremendous difficulties that face the internationalist revolutionary vanguard of the proletariat of Russia. In times like these sudden and swift changes are possible. In No. 47 of Sotsial-Demokrat we gave a clear and direct answer to the natural question: What would our Party do if the revolution placed it in power at this moment? Our answer was: 1) We would forthwith propose peace to all the belligerent peoples; 2) We would announce our conditions of peace as being the immediate liberation of all colonies and all oppressed and non-sovereign peoples; 3) We would immediately begin and carry to its completion the liberation of all the peoples oppressed by the Great-Russians; 4) We do not deceive ourselves for one moment that such conditions would be unacceptable not only to the monarchist but also to the republican bourgeoisie of Germany, and not only to Germany, but also to the capitalist governments of England and France.

We would be forced to wage a revolutionary war against the German bourgeoisie, and not the German bourgeoisie alone. And we would wage this war. We are not pacifists. We are opposed to imperialist wars for the division of spoils among the capitalists, but we have always declared it to be absurd for the revolutionary proletariat to renounce revolutionary wars that may prove necessary in the interests of socialism.

The task we outlined in No. 47 of Sotsial-Demokrat is a gigantic one. It can be effected only by a long series of great class battles between the proletariat and the bourgeoisie. It was not our impatience, nor our desire, but the objective conditions created by the imperialist war that brought the whole of humanity to an impasse, and faced it with the dilemma of either permitting the extermination of more millions of lives and the complete extinction of European civilisation, or handing over the power to the revolutionary proletariat and achieving the socialist revolution in all civilised countries.

To the Russian proletariat has fallen the great honour of initiating the series of revolutions which are arising from the imperialist war with objective inevitability. But the idea that the Russian proletariat is a chosen revolutionary proletariat among the workers of the world is absolutely alien to us. We know full well that the proletariat of Russia is less organised, less prepared, and less class conscious than the proletariat of other countries. It is not any particular virtues it possessed, but rather the specific historical circumstances, that have made the proletariat of Russia for a certain, perhaps very brief, period the skirmishers of the world revolutionary proletariat.

Russia is a peasant country, one of the most backward of European countries. Socialism cannot triumph there directly at once. But the peasant character of the country, coupled with the vast land possessions of the noble landlords, may, to judge by the experience of 1905, give tremendous scope to the bourgeois-democratic revolution in Russia, and make our revolution a prelude to and a step towards the world socialist revolution.

It is in the struggle for these ideas, which have been fully confirmed by the experience of 1905 and the spring of 1917, that our Party was formed and waged an implacable fight against all other parties. For these ideas we shall continue to fight.

Socialism cannot triumph directly and immediately in Russia. But the peasant masses may carry the inevitable and already mature agrarian revolution to the point of confiscating the immense estates of the landlords. This has always been our slogan, and it is now being advocated in Petrograd by the Central Committee of our Party, as well as by our Party newspaper, Pravda. The proletariat will fight for this slogan, while not closing its eyes to the inevitability of obdurate class conflicts between the agricultural wage workers and the impoverished peasants closely associated with them, on the one hand, and the prosperous peasants, whose position was strengthened by the Stolypin agrarian "reform"* (1907-14), on the other. One must not forget that 104 peasant deputies in the First (1906) and Second (1907) Dumas proposed a revolutionary agrarian bill demanding the nationalisation of all lands and their disposal through local committees elected on a completely democratic basis.¹

Such a revolution would not in itself be a socialist revolution. But it would give a great impetus to the world labour movement. It would greatly strengthen the position of the socialist proletariat in Russia and its influence on the agricultural workers and the poor peasants. It would, on the strength of this influence, enable the urban proletariat to develop such revolutionary organisations as the "Soviets of Workers' Deputies," to substitute them for the old instruments of oppression of the bourgeois states, the army, the police and the bureaucracy, and to effect, under the pressure of the intolerable burden of the imperialist war and its consequences, a series of revolutionary measures establishing control over the production and distribution of goods.

The Russian proletariat single-handed cannot successfully complete the socialist revolution. But it can lend such a sweep to the Russian revolution as would create the most favourable conditions for a socialist revolution, and, in a sense, start that revolution. It can render more favourable the conditions under which its most important, most trustworthy and most reliable coadjutor, the European and the American socialist proletariat, will undertake its decisive battles.

Let those of little faith despair on account of the temporary triumph enjoyed within the European Socialist movement by such abhorrent lackeys of the imperialist bourgeoisie as the Scheidemanns, the Legiens, the Davids, etc., in Germany; Sembat, Guesde, Renaudel and Co. in France, and the Fabians and the Labourites in England. We are firmly convinced that this dirty froth on the surface of the world labour movement will be quickly swept away by the tide of revolution.

¹ Reference is here made to the bills proposed by the Group of Toil, regarding which see note to p. 340.*—Ed.

In Germany we are already witnessing the seething unrest of the proletarian masses, who have contributed so much to humanity and Socialism by their stubborn, unyielding and sustained organisational work during the many decades of European "calm"—1871 to 1914. The future of German Socialism is represented not by the traitors Scheidemann, Legien, David and Co., nor by the vacillating and spineless politicians, Haase, Kautsky and their like, who have been crushed by the routine of the "peaceful" period.

The future belongs to the current that gave us Karl Liebknecht, that created the Spartacus Group* and carried on its propaganda in the Bremen Arbeiterpolitik.

The objective conditions of the imperialist war make it certain that the revolution will not be limited to the first stage of the Russian revolution, that the revolution will not be limited to Russia.

The German proletariat is the most trustworthy and the most reliable ally of the Russian and the world proletarian revolution.

When in November 1914 our Party put forward the slogan "Turn the imperialist war into a civil war" of the oppressed against the oppressors for the achievement of socialism, this slogan met with the hostility and malicious ridicule of the social-patriots and with the incredulous, sceptical, spineless, temporising silence of the Social-Democratic "Centre." David, the German social-chauvinist and social-imperialist, called it "insane," while Mr. Plekhanov, the representative of Russian (and Anglo-French) social-chauvinism, i.e., socialism in words and imperialism in deeds, called it "a dream-farce" (*Mittelding zwischen Traum und Komödie*¹). The representatives of the "Centre" preferred to say nothing, or indulged in puerile witticisms regarding this "straight line drawn in empty space."

¹ Something between a dream and a comedy.—Ed.

Now, after March 1917, one must be blind not to see that this slogan is the right one. The transformation of the imperialist war into civil war is becoming a fact.

Long live the proletarian revolution which is beginning in Europe!

On behalf of the comrades leaving Switzerland, members of the R.S.D.L.P. (united under the Central Committee), who approved this letter at a meeting held on April 8, 1917,

N. LENIN

April 8 (March 26), 1917

THE TASKS OF THE PROLETARIAT IN THE PRESENT REVOLUTION *

I ARRIVED in Petrograd  on the night of April 16 (3) and I could therefore, of course, deliver a report at a meeting on April 17 (4) on the tasks of the revolutionary proletariat only upon my own responsibility, and with reservations as to insufficient preparation.

The only thing I could do to facilitate matters for myself and for honest opponents was to prepare written theses. I read them, and gave the text to Comrade Tseretelli. I read them very slowly, twice: first at a meeting of Bolsheviks, then at a meeting of Bolsheviks and Mensheviks.

I publish these personal theses with only the briefest explanatory comments. The comments were developed in far greater detail in the report.

THESES

1) In our attitude towards the war not the slightest concession must be made to "revolutionary defencism," for even under the new government of Lvov and Co. the war on Russia's part unquestionably remains a predatory imperialist war owing to the capitalist nature of that government.

The class conscious proletariat can consent to a revolutionary war, which would really justify revolutionary defencism, only on condition: a) that the power of government pass to the proletariat and the poor sections of the peasantry bordering on the proletariat; b) that all annexations be renounced in deed as well as in words; c) that a complete and real break be made with all capitalist interests.

In view of the undoubted honesty of the mass of the rank-and-file believers in revolutionary defencism, who accept the war as a necessity only and not as a means of conquest; in view of the fact that they are being deceived by the bourgeoisie, it is necessary thoroughly, persistently and patiently to explain their error to them, to explain the indissoluble connection between capital and the imperialist war, and to prove that it is impossible to end the war by a truly democratic, non-coercive peace without the overthrow of capital.

The widespread propaganda of this view among the army on active service must be organised.

Fraternisation.

2) The specific feature of the present situation in Russia is that it represents a transition from the first stage of the revolution—which, owing to the insufficient class consciousness and organisation of the proletariat, led to the assumption of power by the bourgeoisie—to the second stage, which must place power in the hands of the proletariat and the poor strata of the peasantry.

This transition is characterised, on the one hand, by a maximum of freedom (Russia is now the freest of all the belligerent countries in the world); on the other, by the absence of violence in relation to the masses, and, finally, by the naive confidence of the masses in the government of capitalists, the worst enemies of peace and socialism.

This specific situation demands on our part an ability to adapt ourselves to the specific requirements of Party work among unprecedentedly large masses of proletarians who have just awakened to political life.

3) No support must be given to the Provisional Government; the utter falsity of all its promises must be exposed, particularly of those relating to the renunciation of annexations. Exposure, and not the unpardonable illusion-breeding “demand” that this government, a government of capitalists, should cease to be an imperialist government.

4) The fact must be recognised that in most of the Soviets of Workers’ Deputies our Party is in a minority, and so far in a small minority, as against a bloc of all the petty-bourgeois opportunist elements, who have yielded to the influence of the bourgeoisie and are the conveyors of its influence to the proletariat, from the Narodni-Socialists¹ and the Socialist-Revolutionaries down to the Organisation Committee (Chkheidze, Tseretelli, etc.), Steklov, etc., etc.

It must be explained to the masses that the Soviet of Workers' Deputies is the only possible form of revolutionary government and that therefore our task is, as long as this government submits to the influence of the bourgeoisie, to present a patient, systematic, and persistent explanation of its errors and tactics, an explanation especially adapted to the practical needs of the masses.

As long as we are in the minority we carry on the work of criticising and exposing errors and at the same time advocate the necessity of transferring the entire power of state to the Soviets of Workers' Deputies, so that the masses may by experience overcome their mistakes.

5) Not a parliamentary republic—to return to a parliamentary republic from the Soviets of Workers' Deputies would be a retrograde step—but a republic of Soviets of Workers', Agricultural Labourers' and Peasants' Deputies throughout the country, from top to bottom.

Abolition of the police, the army² and the bureaucracy.

The salaries of all officials, who are to be elected and be subject to recall at any time, not to exceed the average wage of a competent worker.

6) The agrarian programme must be centred around the Soviets of Agricultural Labourers' Deputies.

Confiscation of all landed estates.

Nationalisation of all lands in the country, the disposal of such lands to be in the charge of the local Soviets of Agricultural Labourers' and Peasants' Deputies. The organisation of separate Soviets of Deputies of the Poor Peasants. The creation of model farms on each of the large estates (varying from 100 to 300 dessiatins,³ in accordance with local and other conditions, at the discretion of the local institutions) under the control of the Agricultural Labourers' Deputies and for the public account.

¹ The Narodni-Socialist Party occupied a position midway between the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Constitutional-Democrats.—Ed.

² I.e., the standing army to be replaced by the universally armed people.

³ Dessiatin—2.7 acres.—Ed. Eng. ed.

7) The immediate amalgamation of all banks in the country into a single national bank, control over which shall be exercised by the Soviet of Workers' Deputies.

8) Our immediate task shall be not the "introduction of socialism," but to bring social production and distribution of products at once only under the control of the Soviet of Workers' Deputies.

9) Party tasks:

a) Immediate summoning of a Party congress.

b) Alteration of the Party programme, mainly:

1. On the question of imperialism and the imperialist war;

2. On the question of our attitude towards the state and our demand for a "commune state."¹

3. Amendment of our antiquated minimum programme;

c) A new name for the Party.²

10) A new International.

We must take the initiative in creating a revolutionary International, an International directed against the social-chauvinists and against the "Centre."³

In order that the reader may understand what induced me to emphasise as a rare exception the "case" of honest opponents, I would ask him to compare the above theses with the following objection of Mr. Goldenberg: "Lenin," he said, "has planted the banner of civil war in the midst of revolutionary democracy" (quoted in No. 5 of Mr. Plekhanov's *Yedinstvo).

A gem, is it not?

¹ I.e., a state after the model of the Paris Commune.

² Instead of "Social-Democrats," whose official leaders throughout the world have betrayed socialism by deserting to the bourgeoisie (the "defencists" and the vacillating "Kautskians"), we must call ourselves a Communist Party.

³ The "Centre" in the international Social-Democratic movement is the tendency which vacillates between the chauvinists ("defencists") and internationalists, i.e., Kautsky and Co. in Germany, Longuet and Co. in France, Chkheidze and Co. in Russia, Turati and Co. in Italy, MacDonald and Co. in England, etc.

I write, announce and elaborately explain: "In view of the undoubted honesty of the mass of the rank-and-file believers in revolutionary defencism . . . in view of the fact that they are being deceived by the bourgeoisie, it is necessary thoroughly, persistently and patiently to explain their error to them."

But the bourgeois gentlemen who call themselves Social-Democrats, who do not belong either to the broad masses or to the rank-and-file believers in defencism, have the effrontery to present my views thus: "The banner [!] of civil war [of which there is not a word in the theses and not a word in my speech!] has been planted [!] in the midst [!!] of revolutionary democracy. . . ."

What does this mean? In what way does this differ from pogrom agitation, from Russkaya Volya? *

I write, announce and elaborately explain: "The Soviet of Workers' Deputies is the only possible form of revolutionary government, and therefore our task is . . . to present a patient, systematic, and persistent explanation of its errors and tactics, an explanation especially adapted to the practical needs of the masses."

But opponents of a certain type present my views as a call to "civil war in the midst of revolutionary democracy"!

I attacked the Provisional Government because it has not appointed an early date, or any date at all, for the convocation of the Constituent Assembly and because it is confining itself to vague promises. I argued that without the Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies the convocation of the Constituent Assembly is not guaranteed and its success is impossible.

And the view is attributed to me that I am opposed to the speedy convocation of the Constituent Assembly!!!

I would call this "raving," had not long years of political struggle taught me to regard honesty in opponents as a rare exception.

Mr. Plekhanov in his paper called my speech "raving."  Very good, Mr. Plekhanov! But how awkward, uncouth, and slow-witted you are in your polemics! If I delivered a raving speech for two whole hours, how is it that an audience of hundreds tolerated those ravings? Further, why does your paper devote a whole column to an account of my "ravings"? Clumsy, very clumsy!

It is, of course, much easier to shout, scold, and protest than to attempt to recall, to relate, and to explain what Marx and Engels said in 1871, 1872 and 1875 of the experience of the Paris Commune and of the kind of state the proletariat needs.*

Mr. Plekhanov, the former Marxist, presumably does not care to recall Marxism.

I quoted the words of Rosa Luxemburg, who, on August 4, 1914, called German Social-Democracy a "stinking corpse." And Messrs. Plekhanov, Goldenberg and Co. are "offended." On whose account? On account of the German chauvinists, because they were called chauvinists!

They have got into a tangle, these poor Russian social-chauvinists—Socialists in word, and chauvinists in deed.

April 20 (7), 1917

A DUAL POWER *

THE basic question in any revolution is that of state power. Unless this question is understood, there can be no intelligent participation in the revolution, let alone guidance of the revolution.

The striking feature of our revolution is that it has established a dual power. This fact must be grasped first and foremost. Unless it is understood, we cannot advance. We must know, for instance, how to supplement and amend our old Bolshevik "formulas," for, as it proved, they were sound in general, but their concrete realisation turned out to be different. Nobody hitherto thought, or could have thought, of dual power.

In what does this dual power consist? In the fact that side by side with the Provisional Government, the government of the bourgeoisie, there has developed another government, weak and embryonic as yet, but undoubtedly an actually existing and growing government—the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies.

What is the class composition of this other government? It consists of the proletariat and the peasantry (clad in army uniform). What is the political nature of this government? It is a revolutionary dictatorship, i.e., a power based on outright revolutionary seizure, on the direct initiative of the masses from below, and not on a law made by a centralised government. It is an entirely different power from that of the ordinary type of parliamentary bourgeois-democratic republic which has hitherto prevailed in the advanced countries of Europe and America. This circumstance is often forgotten, often not reflected on, yet it is the crux of the matter. This power is of exactly the same type as the Paris Commune of 1871. Its fundamental characteristics are: 1) The source of power is not a law previously discussed and passed by parliament, but the direct initiative of the masses from below, in their localities—outright “seizure,” to use a popular expression; 2) The direct arming of the whole people in place of the police and the army, which are institutions separated from the people and opposed to the people; order in the state under such a power is maintained by the armed workers and peasants themselves, by the armed people itself; 3) Officials and bureaucrats are either displaced by the direct rule of the people or at least placed under special control; they not only become elected officials, but are also subject to recall at the first demand of the people; they are reduced to the position of simple agents; from a privileged stratum occupying highly remunerative “posts,” remunerated on a “bourgeois” scale, they become workers handling a special “kind of weapon,” and remunerated at a salary not exceeding that of a competent worker.

This, and this alone, constitutes the essence of the Paris Commune as a specific type of state. This truth was forgotten and perverted by the Plekhanovs (out-and-out chauvinists who have betrayed Marxism), the Kautskys (the people of the “Centre,” i.e., those who vacillate between chauvinism and Marxism) and generally by all those Social-Democrats, Socialist-Revolutionaries, etc., etc., who are now in control.

They confine themselves to phrases, evasions, tricks; they congratulate each other a thousand times upon the revolution, but they do not wish to ponder over what the Soviets of Workers’ and Soldiers’ Deputies are. They refuse to recognise the obvious truth that inasmuch as the Soviets exist, inasmuch as they are a power, we have in Russia a state of the type of the Paris Commune.

I have underscored the words inasmuch as, for it is only an incipient power. By direct agreement with the bourgeois Provisional Government and by a series of actual concessions, it has surrendered and is surrendering its position to the bourgeoisie.

Why? Is it because Chkheidze, Tseretelli, Steklov and Co. are making a “mistake”? Nonsense. Only a philistine can think so, not a Marxist. The reason is the lack of class consciousness and organisation among the workers and peasants. The “mistake” of the above-mentioned leaders is simply due to their petty-bourgeois position, to the fact that instead of clarifying the minds of the workers, they becloud them; instead of dispersing petty-bourgeois illusions, they instil them; instead of freeing the masses from petty-bourgeois influence, they consolidate that influence.

It should therefore be clear why our comrades also are so mistaken in putting the question "simply": Should the Provisional Government be overthrown immediately?

My answer is: 1) It should be overthrown, for it is an oligarchical, bourgeois, and not a people's government, and cannot provide peace, or bread, or complete freedom; 2) It cannot be overthrown now, for it is being maintained by a direct and indirect, a formal and actual agreement with the Soviets of Workers' Deputies, and particularly with the chief Soviet, the Petrograd Soviet; 3) Generally speaking, it cannot be "overthrown" by any ordinary method, for it rests on the "support" given to the bourgeoisie by the second government—the Soviet of Workers' Deputies, which is the only possible revolutionary government directly expressing the mind and the will of the majority of the workers and peasants. Humanity has not yet evolved and we do not as yet know a type of government superior to and better than the Soviets of Workers', Agricultural Workers', Peasants', and Soldiers' Deputies.

In order to obtain the power of state the class conscious workers must win the majority to their side. As long as no violence is used against the masses, there is no other road to power. We are not Blanquists, we are not in favour of the seizure of power by a minority. We are Marxists, we stand for a proletarian class struggle against petty-bourgeois poison-gas, against chauvinist defencism, phrases, and dependence on the bourgeoisie.

Let us create a proletarian Communist Party. Its elements have already been created by the best adherents of Bolshevism; let us close our ranks and carry on proletarian class work; then from among the proletarians, from among the poor peasants ever greater numbers will come over to our side. For actual experience will from day to day shatter the petty-bourgeois illusions of the "Social-Democrats"—Chkheidze, Tseretelli, Steklov, and the rest—of the “Socialist-Revolutionaries,” petty bourgeois of a still purer water, and so on, and so forth.

The bourgeoisie stands for the undivided power of the bourgeoisie.

The class conscious workers stand for the undivided power of the Soviets of Workers’, Agricultural Workers’, Peasants’, and Soldiers’ Deputies. They stand for an undivided power made possible not by dubious ventures, but by the enlightenment of the proletarian consciousness, by its emancipation from the influence of the bourgeoisie.

The petty bourgeoisie—“Social-Democrats,” Socialist-Revolutionaries, etc., etc., etc.,—vacillates and hinders this process of enlightenment and emancipation.

Such is the actual, the class relation of forces that is determining the tasks now facing us.

April 22 (9), 1917

LETTERS ON TACTICS *

PREFACE

ON April 17 (4), 1917, I had occasion to speak in Petrograd on the subject indicated in the title. I spoke first at a meeting of Bolsheviks. They were delegates to the All-Russian Conference of Workers' and Soldiers' Soviets, who were about to return to their homes and therefore could not allow me to postpone my speech. Upon the conclusion of the meeting, the chairman, Comrade G. Zinoviev, proposed on behalf of the whole assembly that I should immediately repeat my speech at a joint meeting of Bolshevik and Menshevik delegates, who wished to consider the question of uniting the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party.

Difficult though it was for me to repeat my speech forthwith, I nevertheless did not feel justified in refusing, since it was the request of my comrades as well as of the Mensheviks, who, because of their impending departure, were really unable to grant me a respite.

In the course of my speech I read the theses which were published in No. 26 of Pravda, on April 20 (7), 1917.¹

Both the theses and my report created dissension even among the Bolsheviks and the editors of Pravda. After a number of consultations, we unanimously concluded that the most expedient thing would be to discuss our differences openly, thus providing material for the All-Russian Conference of our Party (the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party, united under the Central Committee) to be held in Petrograd on May 3 (April 20), 1917.

It is in pursuance of this decision calling for a discussion that I now publish the following letters. In them I do not pretend to make an exhaustive study of the question, but wish only to outline the principal arguments, which especially and essentially affect the practical tasks of the working class movement.

¹ See "The Tasks of the Proletariat in the Present Revolution," in this volume.—Ed.

FIRST LETTER

An Estimate of the Present Situation

Marxism demands an extremely precise and objectively verifiable analysis of the interrelation of classes and of the concrete peculiarities of each historical moment. We Bolsheviks have always tried faithfully to fulfil this demand, since it is absolutely imperative for a scientific foundation of politics.

"Our teaching is not a dogma, but a guide to action," Marx and Engels used to say; and they ridiculed, and rightly ridiculed, the learning and repetition by rote of "formulas" which at best are capable of giving only an outline of general tasks that are necessarily liable to be modified by the concrete economic and political conditions of each particular phase of the historical process.

What, then, are the clearly established objective facts that must guide the party of the revolutionary proletariat at present in defining the tasks and forms of its activity?

Both in my first Letter from Afar (The First Stage of the First Revolution), published in Nos. 14 and 15 of Pravda, of April 3 and 4 (March 21 and 22), 1917,¹ and in my theses, I define as the "specific feature of the present situation" in Russia the fact that it is a period of transition from the first stage of the revolution to the second. And I therefore considered the basic slogan, the "task of the day," at that moment to be: "Workers, you have displayed marvels of proletarian heroism, the heroism of the people, in the civil war against tsarism; you must display marvels of organisation, organisation of the proletariat and the people, in order to prepare for victory in the second stage of the revolution." (Pravda, No. 15.)

In what does the first stage consist?

In the transfer of the power of state to the bourgeoisie.

¹ Pp. 3-12 in this volume.—Ed.

Before the February-March Revolution of 1917, the state power in Russia was in the hands of one old class, namely, the feudal landed nobility, headed by Nicholas Romanov.

Now, after that revolution, the state power is in the hands of another class, a new class, namely, the bourgeoisie.

The transfer of state power from one class to another class is the first, the principal, the basic sign of a revolution, both in the strictly scientific and in the practical political meaning of the term.

To this extent, the bourgeois, or the bourgeois-democratic, revolution in Russia has been completed.

At this point we hear the clamour of the objectors, of those who so readily call themselves "old Bolsheviks": Did we not always maintain, they say, that the bourgeois-democratic revolution is completed only by the "revolutionary-democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry"? Has the agrarian revolution, which is also a bourgeois-democratic revolution, ended? On the contrary, is it not a fact that it has not even begun?

My answer is: The Bolshevik slogans and ideas in general have been fully corroborated by history; but concretely, things have turned out differently than could have been anticipated (by anyone): they are more original, more specific, more variegated.

Had we ignored or forgotten this fact, we should have resembled those "old Bolsheviks" who have more than once played so sorry a part in the history of our Party by repeating a formula meaninglessly learned by rote, instead of studying the specific and new features of actual reality.

"The revolutionary-democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry" has already become a reality¹ in the Russian revolution; for this "formula" envisages only the interrelation of classes, but does not envisage the concrete political institution which gives effect to this interrelation, to this co-operation. "The Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies"—here we have the "revolutionary-democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry" already accomplished in reality.

¹ In a certain form and to a certain extent.

This formula is already antiquated. Events have removed it from the realm of formulas into the realm of reality, clothed it in flesh and blood, lent it concrete form, and by this very act modified it.

A new and different task now faces us: to effect a split within this dictatorship between the proletarian elements (the anti-defencist, internationalist, "communist" elements, who stand for a transition to the commune) and the petty-proprietor or petty-bourgeois elements (Chkheidze, Tseretelli, Steklov, the Socialist-Revolutionaries and other revolutionary defencists, who are opposed to the movement towards the commune and who favour "supporting" the bourgeoisie and the bourgeois government).

Whoever speaks now of a "revolutionary-democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry" only is behind the times, has consequently in effect gone over to the side of the petty bourgeoisie and is against the proletarian class struggle. He deserves to be consigned to the archive of "Bolshevik" pre-revolutionary antiques (which might be called the archive of "old Bolsheviks").

The revolutionary-democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry has already been realised, but in an extremely original form, and with a number of highly important modifications. I will deal with them in one of my subsequent letters. For the present it is essential to realise the incontestable truth that a Marxist must take cognizance of actual events, of the precise facts of reality, and must not cling to a past theory, which, like all theories, at best only outlines the main and the general, and only approximates to an inclusive grasp of the complexities of living reality.

"Theory, my friend, is grey, but green is the eternal tree of life."

He who continues to regard the "completion" of the bourgeois revolution in the old way sacrifices living Marxism to the dead letter.

According to the old conception, the rule of the proletariat and peasantry, their dictatorship, can and must come after the rule of the bourgeoisie.

But in actual fact, it has already turned out differently: an extremely original, novel and unprecedented interlacing of the one with the other has taken place. Side by side, existing together and simultaneously, we have both the rule of the bourgeoisie (the government of Lvov and Guchkov) and a revolutionary-democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry, the latter voluntarily ceding power to the bourgeoisie and voluntarily transforming itself into an appendage of the bourgeoisie.

For it must not be forgotten that in Petrograd the power is actually in the hands of the workers and soldiers: the new government does not and cannot use violence against them, for there is no police, no army separate from the people, no officialdom standing omnipotently above the people. This is a fact; and it is the kind of fact that is characteristic of a state of the type of the Paris Commune.¹ This fact does not fit into the old schemes. One must know how to adapt schemes to facts, rather than repeat words regarding a "dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry" in general, words which have become meaningless.

In order the better to illuminate the question, let us approach it from another angle.

A Marxist must not abandon the solid ground of analysis of class relations. The bourgeoisie is in power. But is not the mass of the peasants also a bourgeoisie, only of a different stratum, a different kind, a different character? Whence does it follow that this stratum cannot come into power and thus "consummate" the bourgeois-democratic revolution? Why should this be impossible?

That is how the old Bolsheviks often argue.

My reply is that it is quite possible. But, when analysing any given situation, a Marxist must proceed not from the possible, but from the actual.

And actuality reveals the fact—that the freely elected soldiers' and peasants' deputies freely enter the second, the parallel government and freely supplement, develop and complete it. And, just as freely, they surrender their power to the bourgeoisie; which phenomenon does not in the least "undermine" the theory of Marxism, for, as we have always known and have repeatedly pointed out, the bourgeoisie maintains itself not only by virtue of force but also by virtue of the lack of class consciousness, the clinging to old habits, the timidity and lack of organisation of the masses.

¹ Regarding Lenin's conception of "a state of the type of the Paris Commune," cf. "A Dual Power," in this volume.—Ed.

In view of this present-day actuality it is simply ridiculous to turn one's back on this fact and speak of "possibilities."

It is possible that the peasantry may seize all the land and the entire power. Far from forgetting this possibility, far from confining myself to the present moment only, I definitely and clearly formulate the agrarian programme in accordance with the new phenomenon, viz., the profounder cleavage between the agricultural labourers and the poor peasants, on the one hand, and the peasant owners, on the other.

But there is another possibility; it is possible that the peasants will hearken to the advice of the petty-bourgeois party of Socialist-Revolutionaries, which has succumbed to the influence of the bourgeoisie, has gone over to defencism, and which advises waiting until the convocation of the Constituent Assembly, even though the date of its convocation has not yet been fixed.¹

It is possible that the peasants will preserve and prolong their pact with the bourgeoisie, a pact which they have now concluded through the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies in both form and deed.

Many things are possible. It would be a profound mistake to forget the agrarian movement and the agrarian programme. But it would be equally mistaken to forget reality, and reality reveals the fact that an agreement, or—to use a more exact, less legal, but more class-economic expression—that class collaboration exists between the bourgeoisie and the peasantry.

When this fact ceases to be a fact, when the peasantry severs itself from the bourgeoisie, when it seizes the land and power in spite of the bourgeoisie, that will be a new stage of the bourgeois-democratic revolution; and of that I will speak separately.

¹ Lest my words be misinterpreted, I shall anticipate and state at once: I am absolutely in favour of the Soviets of Agricultural Labourers and Peasants immediately taking possession of all the land; but they should themselves observe the strictest order and discipline, not permit the slightest damage to machinery, structures or livestock, and in no wise disorganise agriculture and the production of cereals, but rather develop them, for the soldiers need twice as much bread, and the people must not be allowed to starve.

A Marxist who, in view of the possibility of such a stage in the future, were to forget his duties at the present moment, when the peasantry is compromising with the bourgeoisie, would become a petty bourgeois. For he would in practice be preaching to the proletariat confidence in the petty bourgeoisie ("the petty bourgeoisie, the peasantry, must separate itself from the bourgeoisie within the limits of the bourgeois-democratic revolution"). Because of the "possibility" of so charming and sweet a future in which the peasantry would not form the tail of the bourgeoisie, in which the Socialist-Revolutionaries, the Chkhedizes, Tseretellis and Steklovs, would not be an appendage of the bourgeois government—because of the "possibility" of so pleasant a future, he would be forgetting the unpleasant present, in which the peasantry still forms the tail of the bourgeoisie, and in which the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Social-Democrats have not yet ceased to be appendages of the bourgeois government, His Majesty Lvov's opposition.*

This hypothetical person would be a sugary Louis Blanc, a sugary Kautskian, but not a revolutionary Marxist.

But are we not in danger of falling into subjectivism, of wanting to "skip" over the bourgeois-democratic revolution—which has not yet been completed and has not yet freed itself of the peasant movement—directly to the socialist revolution?

I should be incurring this danger had I said: "No tsar, but a workers' government."  But I did not say that; I said something else. I said that there can be no other government (barring a bourgeois government) in Russia but a government of the Soviets of Workers', Agricultural Labourers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies. I said that power in Russia can now pass from Guchkov and Lvov only to the Soviets. And the fact is that in these Soviets the peasants predominate, the soldiers predominate—the petty bourgeois predominates, to use a scientific, Marxian term, to give a class designation and not a commonplace, philistine, professional designation.

I absolutely insured myself in my theses against skipping over the still existing peasant movement, or the petty-bourgeois movement in general, against the workers' government playing at the "seizure of power," against any kind of Blanquist adventurism; for I directly referred to the experience of the Paris Commune. And this experience, as we know, and as was shown in detail by Marx in 1871 and by Engels in 1891,* absolutely excluded Blanquism, absolutely ensured the direct, immediate and unconditional rule of the majority and the activity of the masses, but only to the extent of the conscious and intelligent action of the majority itself.

In the theses I definitely reduced the question to one of a struggle for influence within the Soviets of Workers', Agricultural Labourers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies. In order to leave no trace of doubt in this respect, I twice emphasised in the theses the necessity for patient and persistent "explanatory" work "adapted to the practical needs of the masses."

Ignorant persons or renegades from Marxism, such as Mr. Plekhanov, may cry anarchism, Blanquism, and so forth. But those who really want to think and learn cannot fail to understand that Blanquism means the seizure of power by a minority, whereas the Soviets of Workers', Agricultural Labourers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies are admittedly the direct and immediate organisation of the majority of the people. Work confined to a struggle for influence within these Soviets cannot, absolutely cannot, blunder into the swamp of Blanquism. Nor can it blunder into the swamp of anarchism, for anarchism denies the necessity for a state and for state power in the period of transition from the rule of the bourgeoisie to the rule of the proletariat, whereas I, with a precision that excludes all possibility of misunderstanding, insist on the necessity for a state in this period, although, in accordance with Marx and the experience of the Paris Commune, not the usual parliamentary bourgeois state, but a state without a standing army, without a police opposed to the people, without an officialdom placed above the people.

When Mr. Plekhanov in his newspaper Yedinstvo clamorously inveighs against anarchism, he is only giving further proof of his rupture with Marxism. In reply to my challenge in Pravda (No.

26)¹ that he should tell what Marx and Engels taught regarding the state in the years 1871, 1872 and 1875, Mr. Plekhanov is and will be obliged to preserve silence on the essence of the question, and indulges instead in outcries in the spirit of the embittered bourgeoisie.

Mr. Plekhanov, the ex-Marxist, has absolutely failed to understand the Marxian doctrine of the state. By the way, the germs of this lack of understanding are to be observed in his German pamphlet on anarchism.*

* * *

Let us now see how Comrade Kamenev in his article in No. 27 of Pravda formulates his "differences"² with my theses and the views expressed above. It will help us to understand them more clearly.

"As regards Comrade Lenin's general scheme," writes Comrade Kamenev, "it appears to us unacceptable, inasmuch as it proceeds from the assumption that the bourgeois-democratic revolution has been completed, and is calculated on the immediate transformation of that revolution into a socialist revolution."

Here we have two major errors.

The first is that the question of the "completeness" of the bourgeois-democratic revolution is wrongly formulated. It is formulated in an abstract, simplified, monochromatic way, if we may so express it, which does not correspond to objective reality. Those who formulate the question thus, those who now ask, "Is the bourgeois-democratic revolution completed?" and nothing more, deprive themselves of the possibility of understanding the real situation, which is extraordinarily complicated and, at least, "bichromatic." This—as regards theory. In practice, they impotently capitulate to petty-bourgeois revolutionism.

And, indeed, in reality we find both the transfer of power to the bourgeoisie (a "completed" bourgeois-democratic revolution of the ordinary type) and the existence, side by side with the actual government, of a parallel government, which represents a

¹ See the conclusion of the article "The Tasks of the Proletariat in the Present Revolution," in this volume.—Ed.

² See note to p. 31.*—Ed.

"revolutionary-democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry." This "also-government" has voluntarily ceded power to the bourgeoisie and has voluntarily chained itself to the bourgeois government.

Is this reality covered by the old-Bolshevik formula of Comrade Kamenev, which declares that "the bourgeois-democratic revolution is not completed"?

No, that formula is antiquated. It is worthless. It is dead. And all attempts to revive it will be vain.

Secondly, a practical question. Who can say whether a special "revolutionary-democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry," detached from the bourgeois government, is now still possible in Russia? Marxist tactics must not be based on unknown factors.

But if it is still possible, then there is one, and only one way to obtain it, namely, the immediate, decisive and irrevocable severance of the proletarian communist elements from the petty-bourgeois elements.

Why?

Because it is not by chance but by necessity that the whole petty bourgeoisie has turned towards chauvinism (defencism), towards "supporting" the bourgeoisie, that it has accepted dependence on the bourgeoisie and fears to do without the bourgeoisie.

How can the petty bourgeoisie be "pushed" into power, when the petty bourgeoisie could assume power now, but does not wish to?

Only the severance of the proletarian, Communist Party and only a proletarian class struggle exempt from the timidity of the petty bourgeois; only the consolidation of proletarians exempt from the influence of the petty bourgeoisie both in deed and in word, can make things so "hot" for the petty bourgeoisie that, under certain circumstances, it will be obliged to assume power. It is not even impossible that Guchkov and Milyukov—again under certain circumstances—will be in favour of full and undivided power being assumed by Chkheidze, Tseretelli, the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Steklov, because, after all, they are all "defencists"!

Those who at once, immediately and irrevocably, separate the proletarian elements of the Soviets (i.e., the proletarian, Communist Party) from the petty-bourgeois elements, will correctly express the interests of the movement in both eventualities: both in the eventuality that Russia will still pass through a special "dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry," not subordinated to the bourgeoisie, and in the eventuality that the petty bourgeoisie will not be able to sever itself from the bourgeoisie and will for ever (that is, until socialism is established) waver between us and it.

Those who in their activities are guided by the simple formula, "The bourgeois-democratic revolution is not completed," give, as it were, a certain guarantee that the petty bourgeoisie is capable of becoming independent of the bourgeoisie; and by that very fact they hopelessly surrender themselves to the tender mercies of the petty bourgeoisie.

Incidentally, on the subject of the "formula," the dictatorship of the proletariat and the peasantry, it would not be amiss to recall that in my article "Two Tactics" (July 1905) I particularly pointed out (Twelve Years, p. 435*) that:

"Like everything else in the world, the revolutionary-democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and the peasantry has a past and a future. Its past is autocracy, serfdom, monarchy and privileges. . . . Its future is the struggle against private property, the struggle of the wage worker against his master, the struggle for socialism. . . ."¹

The mistake made by Comrade Kamenev is that even now, in 1917, he sees only the past of the revolutionary-democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry, when, as a matter of fact, its future has already begun, for the interests and policies of the wage earner and the master have already become sundered in fact, and, moreover, on such an important question as "defencism," the attitude towards the imperialist war.

And this brings me to the second mistake in the remarks of Comrade Kamenev quoted above. He reproaches me with the fact that my scheme "is calculated on the immediate transformation of that [bourgeois-democratic] revolution into a socialist revolution."

¹ See Lenin, Selected Works, Vol. III, "The Two Tactics of Social-Democracy in the Democratic Revolution," p. 99.

That is not true. Far from "calculating" on the "immediate transformation" of our revolution into a socialist revolution, I actually caution against it, and in Thesis No. 8 plainly state: "Our immediate task" is not the "introduction of socialism. . . ."

Is it not obvious that if one calculates on the immediate transformation of our revolution into a socialist revolution one cannot be opposed to the introduction of socialism as an immediate task?

Moreover, it is not possible to establish even a "commune state" (i.e., a state organised on the type of the Paris Commune) in Russia "immediately," since that would require that the majority of the deputies in all (or in most of) the Soviets should clearly recognise the utter erroneousness and perniciousness of the tactics and policy of the Socialist-Revolutionaries, Chkheidze, Tseretelli, Steklov, etc. And I explicitly declared that in this respect I calculate only on "patient" explanation (is it necessary to be patient in order to bring about a change which can be realised "immediately"?).

Comrade Kamenev rather "impatiently" let himself go and repeated the bourgeois prejudice regarding the Paris Commune, namely, that it wanted to introduce socialism "immediately." That is not so. The Commune, unfortunately, was far too slow in introducing socialism. The real essence of the Commune lies not where the bourgeois usually looks for it, but in the creation of a particular type of state. A state of this type has already been born in Russia: it is the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies.

Comrade Kamenev has not pondered over the fact and the significance of the existing Soviets, their identity as to type and social and political character with the state of the Commune; and instead of studying a fact, he talks of what I allegedly calculated on as a thing of the "immediate" future. The result is, unfortunately, a repetition of the trick practised by many bourgeois: attention is diverted from the question of the nature of the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, of whether they are a type superior to the parliamentary republic, whether they are more beneficial to the people, more democratic and more adapted, for instance, to the struggle for bread—attention is diverted from this essential, immediate question, rendered urgent by the force of events, to the frivolous, pseudo-scientific, but in reality hollow and professorially lifeless question of "calculations on an immediate transformation."

A frivolous question falsely stated. I "calculate" solely and exclusively on the workers, soldiers and peasants being able to tackle better than the officials, better than the police, the practical and difficult problems of increasing the production of foodstuffs and their better distribution, the better provisioning of the soldiers, etc., etc.

I am profoundly convinced that the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies will develop the independent activity of the masses of the people far more quickly and far more effectively than a parliamentary republic (I will make a comparison of the two types of state in greater detail in another letter). They will decide more effectively, more practically, and more correctly what steps can be taken towards socialism, and how. Control over a bank, amalgamation of all banks into one, is not yet socialism, but it is a step towards socialism. Today such steps are being taken in Germany by the Junkers and the bourgeoisie against the interests of the people. Tomorrow, if the entire power of the state is in its hands, the Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies will more effectively take these steps to the advantage of the people.

And what renders these steps essential?

Famine. Economic disorganisation. Impending collapse. The horrors of war. The horror of the wounds being inflicted on mankind by the war.

Comrade Kamenev concludes his article with the statement that "in a broad discussion he hopes to carry his point of view, the only possible point of view for the revolutionary Social-Democratic Party, if it wishes, as it must, to remain to the end the party of the revolutionary masses of the proletariat, and not to become transformed into a group of Communist propagandists."

It seems to me that these words betray a completely erroneous estimate of the situation. Comrade Kamenev contrasts a "party of the masses" and a "group of propagandists." But just now the "masses" have yielded to the intoxication of "revolutionary" defencism. Is it not more worthy of internationalists at this moment to be able to resist "mass" intoxication than to "wish to remain" with the masses, i.e., to succumb to the general epidemic? Have we not seen how the chauvinists in all the belligerent countries of Europe justified themselves by the wish to "remain with the masses"? Is it not essential to be able for a while to remain in a minority as against the "mass" intoxication? Is it not the work of the propagandists which at the present moment is the main factor in clearing the proletarian line of defencist and petty-bourgeois "mass" intoxication? It was just this fusion of the masses, proletarian and non-proletarian, without distinction of class differences among those masses, that formed one of the conditions for the defencist epidemic. To speak with contempt of a "group of propagandists" advocating a proletarian line is, we think, not altogether becoming.

April 1917

THE TASKS OF THE PROLETARIAT IN OUR REVOLUTION *

DRAFT OF A PLATFORM FOR THE PROLETARIAN PARTY

THE historical moment through which Russia is now passing is marked by the following main characteristics:

THE CLASS CHARACTER OF THE REVOLUTION

1) The old tsarist power, representing a handful of feudal landlords who commanded the entire machinery of state (the army, the police and the bureaucracy), has been broken and set aside, but not utterly destroyed. Formally, the monarchy has not been abolished. The Romanov gang continues to hatch its monarchist intrigues. The vast landed possessions of the feudal landlords have not been abolished.

2) The state power in Russia has passed into the hands of a new class, namely, the bourgeoisie and the landlords who have turned bourgeois. To that extent the bourgeois-democratic revolution in Russia has been completed.

Having come to power, the bourgeoisie formed a bloc with openly monarchist elements, notorious for their exceptionally ardent support of Nicholas the Bloody and Stolypin the Hangman in 1906-14 (Guchkov and others to the Right of the Cadets). The new bourgeois government of Lvov and Co. attempted to negotiate with the Romanovs for the restoration of the monarchy in Russia. While making a noisy play of revolutionary phrases, this government filled positions of authority with partisans of the old regime. It strove to reform the machinery of state (the army, the police and the bureaucracy) as little as possible, and has turned it over to the bourgeoisie. This government has already begun to hinder the revolutionary initiative of mass action and the seizure of power by the people from below, which is the sole guarantee of any real success of the revolution.

The government has not yet fixed a date for the convocation of the Constituent Assembly. It is not laying a finger on the landed estates, the material foundation of feudal tsarism. The government does not even contemplate starting an investigation and making public the activities of the monopolistic financial concerns, such as the large banks, the syndicates and cartels of the capitalists, etc., or of exercising control over them.

The chief, the decisive ministerial posts in the new government (the Ministry for the Interior and the Ministry for War, i.e., the command over the army, the police, the bureaucracy and the entire machinery for the oppression of the masses) are filled by notorious monarchists and supporters of agrarian landlordism. The Cadets, those day-old republicans, those involuntary republicans, have been assigned posts of secondary importance, having no direct relation to the exercise of power over the people or to the machinery of state. A. Kerensky, a Trudovik,¹ an "also-Socialist," has no function whatsoever, except to lull the vigilance and attention of the people with well-sounding phrases.

For the reasons enumerated, the new bourgeois government does not deserve the confidence of the proletariat even in the sphere of internal politics, and no support of that government by the proletariat is permissible.

THE FOREIGN POLICY OF THE NEW GOVERNMENT

3) In the domain of foreign policy, which has come to the forefront owing to objective circumstances, the new government stands for the continuation of the imperialist war, a war waged in concert with the imperialist powers, Great Britain, France, and others, for the division of capitalist spoils and for the strangling of small and feeble nations.

Subordinated to the interests of Russian capital and of its powerful protector and master, Anglo-French imperialist capital, the most wealthy in the world, the new government, notwithstanding the wishes expressed in the most definite fashion on behalf of the undoubted majority of the peoples of Russia by the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, has taken no real steps whatsoever to put a stop to the slaughter of nations in the interests of the capitalists. It has not even published the secret treaties of a frankly predatory character (for the partition of Persia, the spoliation of China, the spoliation of Turkey, the partition of Austria, the annexation of Eastern Prussia, the annexation of the German colonies, etc.), which, as everybody knows, bind Russia to Anglo-French predatory imperialist capital. It has confirmed these treaties concluded by tsarism, which for centuries robbed and oppressed more peoples than other tyrants and despots, and which not only oppressed, but also disgraced and debauched, the Great-Russian people by transforming it into an executioner of other peoples.

¹ Trudoviki, or Group of Toil, the name adopted by the peasant representatives in the Duma.—Ed. Eng. ed.

The new government has confirmed these shameful cut-throat treaties and has not proposed an immediate armistice to all the belligerent peoples, in spite of the clearly expressed demand of the majority of the peoples of Russia, voiced through the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies. It has evaded the issue with the help of solemn, sonorous, ceremonious, but absolutely empty declarations and phrases, such as in the mouths of bourgeois diplomats have always served, and still serve, to deceive the confiding and gullible masses of the oppressed people.

4) Hence, the new government is not deserving of the slightest confidence in the field of foreign policy; and to demand that it should make known the will for peace of the peoples of Russia, that it should renounce annexations, and so forth, is in practice to deceive the people, to inspire them with hopes that cannot be realised, to retard their mental enlightenment, indirectly to reconcile them to the continuation of a war the social character of which is determined not by good intentions, but by the class character of the government that wages the war, by the connection between the class represented by this government and the imperialist finance capital of Russia, Great Britain, France, etc., by the real and actual policy which that class is pursuing.

A PECULIAR DUAL POWER AND ITS CLASS SIGNIFICANCE

5) The main peculiarity of our revolution, a peculiarity urgently requiring the most thoughtful analysis, is the dual power which was established in the very first days of the triumph of the revolution.

This dual power is manifested in the existence of two governments: one is the main, the real, the actual government of the bourgeoisie, the "Provisional Government" of Lvov and Co., which controls all the organs of power; the other is a supplementary and parallel government, a "supervisory" government in the shape of the Petrograd Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, which possesses no organs of state power, but which derives its authority directly from a clear and indisputable majority of the people, from the armed workers and soldiers.

The class origin and the class significance of this dual power consist in the fact that the March Revolution not only swept away the tsarist monarchy completely, not only transferred the entire power to the bourgeoisie, but also approached very closely to the point of a revolutionary-democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry. The Petrograd and the other, the local, Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies represent precisely such a dictatorship (that is, a government power resting not on law but on the direct force of armed masses of the population), a dictatorship precisely of the above-mentioned classes.

6) The second peculiarity of the Russian revolution, a highly important one, is the circumstance that the Petrograd Soviet of Soldiers' and Workers' Deputies, which, everything goes to show, enjoys the confidence of most of the local Soviets, is voluntarily transferring the power of the state, is voluntarily surrendering its own supremacy, to the bourgeoisie and its Provisional Government; and, having entered into an agreement to support the latter, is limiting its own function to that of an observer supervising the convocation of the Constituent Assembly (the date of which has not yet even been announced by the Provisional Government).

This extremely peculiar circumstance, unparalleled in history in such a form, has led to the interlocking of two dictatorships: the dictatorship of the bourgeoisie (for the Provisional Government of Lvov and Co. is a dictatorship, i.e., a power based not on law, nor on the previously expressed will of the people, but on seizure by force, accomplished by a definite class, namely, the bourgeoisie) and the dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry (the Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies).

There is not the slightest doubt that such an "interlocking" cannot last long. Two powers cannot exist in a state. One of them is bound to give way; and the entire Russian bourgeoisie is already straining every nerve, is everywhere striving in every possible way to remove and enfeeble the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, to compel them to give way, and to establish the sole power of the bourgeoisie.

The dual power expresses but a transitional phase in the development of the revolution, in which it has gone farther than the ordinary bourgeois-democratic revolution, but has not yet reached a "pure" dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry.

The class significance (and class explanation) of this transitional and unstable situation is as follows: like all revolutions, our revolution, in the struggle against tsarism, demanded the greatest heroism and self-sacrifice on the part of the masses and moreover immediately drew unprecedentedly vast numbers of ordinary citizens into the movement.

From the point of view of science and practical politics, one of the chief symptoms of every real revolution is the rapid, sudden, and sharp increase in the number of "ordinary citizens" who begin to participate actively, independently and vigorously in political life and in the organisation of the state.

Such is the case in Russia. Russia at present is seething. Millions of people who had been politically dormant for ten years and politically crushed by the terrible oppression of tsarism and by inhuman toil for the landlords and manufacturers have awakened and been drawn into politics. Who are these millions? For the most part small proprietors, petty bourgeois, people midway between the capitalists and the wage workers. Russia is the most petty-bourgeois of European countries.

A gigantic petty-bourgeois wave has swept over everything and overwhelmed the class conscious proletariat, not only by force of numbers but also ideologically; that is, it has infected wide circles of workers with the petty-bourgeois outlook on politics.

The petty bourgeois are in reality dependent upon the bourgeoisie, for they live like masters and not like proletarians (from the point of view of their place in social production), and follow the bourgeoisie in their way of thinking.

An attitude of unreasoning confidence in the capitalists—the worst foes of peace and socialism—characterises the politics of the Russian masses at the present moment; such is the fruit that has grown with revolutionary rapidity on the social and economic soil of the most petty-bourgeois of European countries. That is the class basis for the “agreement” between the Provisional Government and the Soviet of Workers’ and Soldiers’ Deputies (I must emphasise that I am referring not so much to a formal agreement as to the practical support, the tacit understanding, the naively trustful surrender of power), an agreement which has presented the Guchkovs with a choice morsel—real power, and the Soviet with promises and honours (for the time being), with flattery, phrases, assurances, and the bowings and scrapings of the Kerenskys.

The reverse side of the medal is the inadequate numerical strength of the proletariat in Russia and its insufficient class consciousness and organisation.

The Narodnik ¹ parties, including the Socialist-Revolutionaries, have always been petty-bourgeois. This is also true of the party of the Organisation Committee (Chkheidze, Tseretelli, etc.). The independent revolutionaries (Steklov and others) have similarly drifted with the tide, or have not succeeded in battling the tide.

THE SPECIFIC NATURE OF THE TACTICS WHICH FOLLOW FROM THE ABOVE

7) For the Marxist, who must reckon with objective facts, with the masses, classes, and so on, rather than with individuals, the specific nature of the present situation as described above must determine the specific tactics of the present moment.

The specific character of these tactics calls for the necessity of “pouring vinegar and bile into the sweet water of revolutionary-democratic eloquence" (as a fellow member of the Central Committee of our Party, Teodorovich, so aptly expressed it at yesterday's session of the All-Russian Congress of Railwaymen in Petrograd). Our work must be one of criticism, of explaining the mistakes of the petty-bourgeois Socialist-Revolutionary and Social-Democratic parties, of preparing and welding the elements of a class conscious proletarian Communist Party, and of releasing the proletariat from the general petty-bourgeois enchantment.

¹ The Narodnik or “populist” parties, representatives of a petty-bourgeois, peasant socialism, originated in Russia in the middle of the last century. —Ed. Eng. ed.

This may appear to be "nothing more" than propaganda work, but in reality it is extremely practical revolutionary work; for there is no advance for a revolution that has come to a standstill, that has choked itself with phrases, and that keeps marking time, not because of external obstacles, not because of the violence of the bourgeoisie (so far Guchkov only threatens to use violence against the soldiers), but because of the naive trustfulness of the masses.

Only by combating this naive trustfulness (and one can combat it only ideologically, by comradely persuasion, by pointing to the lessons of experience) can we escape the prevailing orgy of revolutionary phrases and make real progress in stimulating the class consciousness both of the proletariat and of the masses in general, as well as in stimulating their bold and determined initiative in the localities and the arbitrary realisation, development and consolidation of liberties, democracy, and of the principle of the ownership of all the land by the people.

8) The world-wide experience of bourgeois and landlord governments has developed two methods of keeping the people in subjection. The first is violence. Nicholas Romanov I, called Nicholas Palkin,¹ and Nicholas II, the Bloody, demonstrated to the Russian people the maximum of what can and cannot be done by this hangman's method. But there is another method, best developed by the English and French bourgeoisie, who "learnt their lesson" in a series of great revolutions and revolutionary movements of the masses. That is the method of deception, flattery, fine phrases, numberless promises, petty sops, and concessions of the unessential while retaining the essential.

¹ From the Russian word palka, meaning stick, club.—Ed. Eng. ed.

The specific feature of the present moment in Russia is a dizzy transition from the first method to the second, from violent oppression of the people to flattering and deceiving the people by false promises. Vaska the cat listens, but goes on eating.¹ Milyukov and Guchkov hold power, they are protecting the profits of capitalism and conducting an imperialist war in the interests of Russian and Anglo-French capital, and they deliver themselves of promises, declamations and impressive statements when replying to the speeches of "cooks" like Chkheidze, Tseretelli and Steklov, who threaten, exhort, conjure, beseech, demand and declare. . . . Vaska the cat listens, but goes on eating.

But from day to day trustful naiveté and naive trustfulness will diminish, especially among the proletarians and poor peasants, who are being taught by experience (by their social and economic position) to distrust the capitalists.

The leaders of the petty bourgeoisie "must" teach the people to trust the bourgeoisie. The proletarians must teach the people to distrust the bourgeoisie.

REVOLUTIONARY DEFENCISM AND ITS CLASS NATURE

9) Revolutionary defencism must be regarded as the most important and striking manifestation of the petty-bourgeois wave that has overwhelmed "nearly everything." There can be no greater hindrance to the progress and success of the Russian revolution.

Those who have yielded on this point and are unable to extricate themselves are lost to the revolution. But the masses yield in a different way from the leaders; and they extricate themselves differently, by a different course of development, by different means.

Revolutionary defencism, is, on the one hand, a result of the deception practised on the masses by the bourgeoisie, a result of the naive trustfulness of the peasants and a section of the workers; it is, on the other, an expression of the interests and the viewpoint of the small master, who is to some extent interested in annexations and bank profits, and who "religiously" guards the traditions of tsarism, which demoralised the Great-Russians by doing hangman's work among the other peoples.

¹ A quotation from a fable by Krylov. The cook finds the cat, Vaska, swallowing a chicken; the cook uses moral suasion. The cat listens, but goes on eating.—Ed. Eng. ed.

The bourgeoisie deceives the people by playing upon the noble pride of the revolution and by pretending that the social and political character of the war, as far as Russia is concerned, underwent a change with this stage of the revolution, with the substitution of the bourgeois near-republic of Guchkov and Milyukov for the tsarist monarchy. The people believe it—for the time being—owing in a large degree to old-time prejudices, by virtue of which they regard the other peoples of Russia, i.e., the non-Great-Russians, almost as the property and patrimony of the Great-Russians. This vile demoralisation of the Great-Russian people by the tsarist government, which taught them to regard the other peoples as something inferior, something belonging "by right" to Great Russia, could not be cured instantly.

What is required of us is the ability to explain to the masses that the social and political character of the war is determined not by the "good intentions" of individuals or groups, or even of peoples, but by the position of the class which conducts the war, by the class policy of which the war is a continuation, by the ties of capital, which is the dominant economic force in modern society, by the imperialist character of international capital, by Russia's dependence in finance, banking and diplomacy upon Great Britain, France, etc. To explain this to the masses skilfully and in a comprehensible way is not easy; none of us could do it at once without committing errors.

But such, and only such, must be the direction or, rather, the contents of our propaganda. The slightest concession to revolutionary defencism is treason to socialism and a complete renunciation of internationalism, no matter by what fine phrases and "practical" considerations it is justified.

The slogan "Down with the war" is, of course, a correct one. But it fails to take into account the specific nature of the tasks of the present moment and of the necessity of approaching the masses in a different way. It is, in my opinion, similar to the slogan "Down with the tsar," with which the inexperienced agitator of the "good old days" went simply and directly to the country districts—and received a beating. The rank-and-file supporters of revolutionary defencism are sincere, not in the personal, but in the class sense, i.e., they belong to classes (workers and poor peasants) which in actual fact have nothing to gain from annexations and the strangulation of other peoples. Their position is different from that of the bourgeois and the intellectuals, who know very well that it is impossible to renounce annexations without renouncing the rule of capital, and who unscrupulously deceive the masses with fine phrases, with unlimited promises and endless assurances.

The rank-and-file believer in defencism regards the matter in a simple, matter-of-fact way: "I don't want annexations, but the German is after me; therefore I am defending a just cause and not imperialist interests." It must be explained very patiently to a man like this that it is not a question of his personal wishes, but of mass, class, political relations and conditions, of the connection between the war and the interests of capital, the international network of banks, and so forth. Only such a struggle against defencism will be serious and promising of success—perhaps not a rapid success, but one that will be real and durable.

HOW CAN THE WAR BE ENDED?

10) The war cannot be ended "at will." It cannot be ended by the decision of one party. It cannot be ended by "sticking your bayonet in the ground," as one soldier, a defencist, expressed it.

The war cannot be ended by an "agreement" between the Socialists of the various countries, by the "action" of the proletarians of all countries, by the "will" of the peoples, and so forth. Phrases of this kind, which fill the articles of the defencist and semi-defencist—semi-internationalist papers and innumerable resolutions, appeals and manifestoes, and the resolutions of the Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, are nothing but empty, innocent and pious wishes of the petty bourgeois. Nothing is more pernicious than such phrases as "ascertaining the will of the peoples for peace," as the sequence of revolutionary action of the proletariat (after the Russian proletariat comes the "turn" of the German), etc. All this is in the spirit of Louis Blanc, daydreaming, a game of "political campaigning," and in reality but a repetition of the fable of Vaska the cat.

The war is not a product of the evil will of rapacious capitalists, although it is undoubtedly being fought solely in their interests and they alone are being enriched by it. The war is a product of half a century of development of world capitalism and of its million threads and connections. One cannot escape from the imperialist war, one cannot achieve a democratic, non-oppressive peace without first overthrowing the power of capital and without the transfer of the power of state to another class, the proletariat.

The Russian revolution of February-March 1917 was the beginning of the transformation of the imperialist war into a civil war. The revolution took the first step towards ending the war; but it requires a second step, namely, the transfer of the power of state to the proletariat, to make the end of the war a certainty. This will be the beginning of a "breach in the front" on a world-wide scale, a breach in the front of the interests of capital; and only after having broken this front can the proletariat save mankind from the horrors of war and endow it with the blessings of a durable peace.

To such a "breach in the front" of capitalism the Russian revolution has already brought the Russian proletariat by creating the Soviets of Workers' Deputies.

THE NEW TYPE OF STATE DEVELOPING IN OUR REVOLUTION

11) The Soviets of Workers', Soldiers', Peasants' and other Deputies are not understood; not only in the sense that their class character, their part in the Russian revolution, is not clear to the majority, but also in the sense that they constitute a new form, or rather a new type of state.

The most perfect and advanced type of bourgeois state is the parliamentary democratic republic: power is vested in parliament; the state machine, the apparatus and organ of administration, is of the customary kind: a standing army, a police and a bureaucracy which in practice is permanent and privileged and stands above the people.

But since the end of the nineteenth century, revolutionary epochs have been producing a superior type of democratic state, a state which in certain respects, as Engels puts it, ceases to be a state, is "no longer a state in the proper sense of the word." * This state is of the type of the Paris Commune, one in which a standing army and police severed from the people are replaced by the directly armed people themselves. This feature constituted the very essence of the Commune, which has been so maligned and slandered by the bourgeois writers, and to which has been erroneously ascribed, among other things, the intention of "introducing" socialism immediately.

This is the type of state which the Russian revolution began to create in the years 1905 and 1917. A Republic of Soviets of Workers', Soldiers', Peasants' and other Deputies, united in an All-Russian Constituent Assembly of the people's representatives, or in a Council of Soviets, etc., is what is being realised in our country now, at this juncture, by the initiative of millions of people who, of their own accord, are creating a democracy in their own way, without waiting until Messieurs the Cadet professors draft their legislative projects for a parliamentary bourgeois republic, or until the pedants and routine worshippers of petty-bourgeois "Social-Democracy," like Plekhanov and Kautsky, renounce their distortions of the teaching of Marxism on the subject of the state.

Marxism differs from anarchism in that it recognises the necessity for the state and for state power in a period of revolution in general, and in the period of transition from capitalism to socialism in particular.

Marxism differs from the petty-bourgeois, opportunist "Social-Democracy" of Plekhanov, Kautsky and Co. in that it recognises that during the said periods what is required is a state not of the customary parliamentary bourgeois republican type, but of the type of the Paris Commune.

The main differences between a state of the latter type and the bourgeois state are as follows.

It is extremely easy (as history proves) to revert from a bourgeois republic to a monarchy, since all the machinery of repression, viz., the army, the police, and the bureaucracy, is left intact. The Commune and the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers', Peasants' and other Deputies smash and abolish that machinery.

A parliamentary bourgeois republic hampers and stifles the independent political life of the masses and their direct participation in the democratic organisation of the life of the state from top to bottom. The contrary is the case with the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies.

The latter reproduce the type of state that was being evolved by the Paris Commune and that Marx said was "the political form at last discovered under which to work out the economical emancipation of labour." *

The objection is usually offered that the Russian people are not yet prepared for the "introduction" of the Commune. This was the argument of the serfowners, who claimed that the peasants were not prepared for freedom. The Commune, i.e., the Soviets of Workers' and Peasants' Deputies, does not "introduce," does not intend to "introduce," and must not introduce reforms which have not absolutely matured both in economic reality and in the consciousness of the overwhelming majority of the people. The greater the economic collapse and the crisis produced by the war, the more urgent becomes the need for a more perfect political form, which will facilitate the healing of the frightful wounds inflicted by the war upon mankind. The less the organisational experience of the Russian people, the more determinedly must we proceed to the organisational development of the people themselves, and not merely of the bourgeois politicians and well-placed bureaucrats.

The sooner we cast off the old prejudices of a Marxism falsified and distorted by Plekhanov, Kautsky and Co., the more diligently we set about helping the people to organise Soviets of Workers' and Peasants' Deputies everywhere and immediately, and the latter to take all aspects of life under their control, and the longer Messrs. Lvov and Co. delay the convocation of the Constituent Assembly, the easier will it be for the people (through the medium of the Constituent Assembly, or independently of the Constituent Assembly, if Lvov delays its convocation too long) to cast their decision in favour of a Republic of Soviets of Workers' and Peasants' Deputies. Blunders during the new process of organisational development of the people themselves are at first inevitable; but it is better to blunder and go forward than to wait until the professors of law summoned by Mr. Lvov have drafted their laws for the convocation of the Constituent Assembly, for the perpetuation of the parliamentary bourgeois republic and for the strangling of the Soviets of Workers' and Peasants' Deputies.

If we organise and conduct our propaganda efficiently, not only the proletarians, but nine-tenths of the peasantry will be opposed to the re-establishment of the police, will be opposed to an irremovable and privileged bureaucracy and to an army separated from the people. And that alone makes up the new type of state.

12) The substitution of a people's militia for the police is a reform that follows from the entire course of the revolution and that is now being introduced in most localities of Russia. We must explain to the masses that in the majority of revolutions of the usual bourgeois type, this reform has never been long-lived, and that even the most democratic and republican bourgeoisie soon re-established the police of the old tsarist type, a police separated from the people, controlled by the bourgeoisie and adapted in every way to oppressing the people.

There is only one means of preventing the re-establishment of the police, namely, to organise a national militia and to fuse it with the army (the standing army to be replaced by the universally armed people). Service in this militia shall extend to all citizens of both sexes between the ages of fifteen and sixty-five, if these tentatively suggested age limits determine the participation of youths and old people. Capitalists must pay their workers, servants and others for the days devoted to public service in the militia. Unless women are brought to take an independent part not only in political life generally, but also in daily and universal public service, it is idle to speak even of a complete and stable democracy, let alone socialism. Certain "police" functions, such as the care of the sick and of homeless children, pure food supervision, etc., will never be satisfactorily discharged until women are on a footing of perfect equality with men, not only on paper but in reality.

The tasks which the proletariat must put before the masses in order to protect, consolidate and develop the revolution are to prevent the re-establishment of the police and to mobilise the organisational forces of the entire people for the creation of a universal militia.

THE AGRARIAN AND THE NATIONAL PROGRAMMES

13) At the present moment it is impossible to say for certain whether a powerful agrarian revolution will develop in the Russian countryside in the near future. We cannot say how profound is the class cleavage, which has undoubtedly grown more profound latterly, between the agricultural labourers, wage workers, and poor peasants ("semi-proletarians") on the one hand, and the well-to-do and middle peasants (capitalists and petty capitalists) on the other. Such questions will be decided, and can be decided, only by actual experience.

But as the party of the proletariat we are in duty bound not only to announce an agrarian programme immediately but also to advocate practical measures which are immediately realisable in the interests of the peasant agrarian revolution in Russia.

We must demand the nationalisation of all the land, i.e., that all land in the state should become the possession of the central state power. This power shall fix the size, etc., of the migration fund,¹ issue laws for the conservation of forests, for land improvement, etc., and absolutely prohibit the intermediary of middlemen between the owner of the land, i.e., the state, and the tenant, i.e., the tiller (prohibit all private transfer of land). But the disposal of the land, the determination of the local regulations governing land tenure and use, must in no case be left in the hands of bureaucrats and officials, but must be vested exclusively in the local and regional Soviets of Peasants' Deputies.

¹ Lands assigned for allotment to peasants desirous of migrating from congested areas.—Ed. Eng. ed.

In order to improve the technique of grain growing and to increase output, and in order to develop rational cultivation on a large scale under public control, we must endeavour through the Peasants' Committees to secure the transformation of every confiscated estate into a large model farm controlled by the Soviets of Agricultural Labourers' Deputies.

In order to counteract the petty-bourgeois phrases and policy prevailing among the Socialist-Revolutionaries, particularly the idle talk concerning "consumption standards," "labour standards,"¹ the "socialisation of the land," etc., the party of the proletariat must make it clear that small peasant farming under a commodity production system offers no escape for mankind from the poverty and oppression of the masses.

Without necessarily splitting the Soviets of Peasants' Deputies at once, the party of the proletariat must make clear the necessity of organising separate Soviets of Agricultural Labourers' Deputies and separate Soviets of deputies from the poor (semi-proletarian) peasants or, at least, of holding regular separate conferences of deputies of this class position in the shape of separate fractions or parties within the Soviets of Peasants' Deputies. Otherwise all the sugary petty-bourgeois talk of the Narodniki regarding the peasants in general will but serve as a shield for the deceit played on the propertyless mass by the well-to-do peasants, who are but a variety of capitalists.

To counteract the bourgeois-liberal or purely bureaucratic sermons preached by many Socialist-Revolutionaries and Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, who advise the peasants not to seize the landlords' estates and not to start agrarian reform pending the convocation of the Constituent Assembly, the party of the proletariat must urge the peasants to set about putting agrarian reform into effect at once, on their own initiative, and to con-liquidate the landlords' estates immediately upon the decision of the local peasants' deputies.

¹ Consumption standard: an allotment sufficiently large to supply the requirements of a peasant household. Labour standard: an allotment that can be cultivated by the members of the peasant's household.—Ed. Eng. ed.

At the same time, it is particularly important to insist on the necessity of increasing the production of foodstuffs for the soldiers at the front and for the towns, and on the absolute inadmissibility of any damage to livestock, tools, machinery, structures, etc.

14) As regards the national question, the proletarian party first of all must insist on the promulgation and immediate realisation of complete freedom of secession from Russia for all nations and peoples who were oppressed by tsarism, or who were forcibly annexed to, or forcibly retained within, the boundaries of the state.

All statements, declarations and manifestoes concerning the renunciation of annexations which are not accompanied by the realisation of the right of secession are but bourgeois deceptions practised on the people, or else pious petty-bourgeois aspirations.

The proletarian party strives to create as large a state as possible, for that is to the advantage of the toilers; it strives to bring about closer ties between nations and the further fusion of nations; but it desires to achieve this aim not by force, but by a free, fraternal union of the workers and the toiling masses of all nations.

The more democratic the Russian republic is and the more successfully it organises itself into a Republic of Soviets of Workers' and Peasants' Deputies, the more powerful will be the force of voluntary attraction towards such a republic on the part of the toiling masses of all nations.

Complete freedom of secession, the broadest local (and national) autonomy, and detailed guarantees of the rights of national minorities—such is the programme of the revolutionary proletariat.

NATIONALISATION OF THE BANKS AND CAPITALIST SYNDICATES

15) The party of the proletariat cannot set itself the aim of "introducing" socialism in a country of small peasantry as long as the overwhelming majority of the population has not realised the necessity for a socialist revolution.

But only bourgeois sophists, who hide behind "near-Marxist" phrases, can derive from this truth a justification of a policy of postponing immediate revolutionary measures, the time for which has become ripe, which have been frequently resorted to during the war by a number of bourgeois states, and which are absolutely essential in order to combat impending total economic disorganisation and famine.

Such measures as the nationalisation of the land and of the banks and syndicates of capitalists or, at least, the immediate establishment of the control of the Soviets of Workers' Deputies over them, measures which do not in any way imply the "introduction" of socialism, must be absolutely insisted on, and, whenever possible, introduced by revolutionary means. Without such measures, which are only steps towards socialism, and which are entirely feasible economically, it will be impossible to heal the wounds of the war and to prevent the impending collapse. The party of the revolutionary proletariat will never hesitate to lay hands on the fabulous profits of the capitalists and bankers who are scandalously enriching themselves on the war.

THE SITUATION WITHIN THE SOCIALIST INTERNATIONAL

16) The international obligations of the Russian working class are at the present time assuming prominence.

Everybody swears by internationalism these days. Even the chauvinist-defencists, even Messrs. Plekhanov and Potresov, even Kerensky, call themselves internationalists. All the more urgently, therefore, does it become the duty of the proletarian party to draw a clear, precise and definite distinction between internationalism in deeds and internationalism in words.

Mere appeals to the workers of all countries, empty assurances of devotion to internationalism, direct or indirect attempts to establish a "sequence" of revolutionary proletarian action in the various belligerent countries, efforts to conclude "agreements" between the Socialists of the belligerent countries on the question of the revolutionary struggle, pother over the summoning of Socialist congresses for the purpose of a peace campaign—no matter how sincere the authors of such ideas, efforts, and plans may be—amount, as far as their objective significance is concerned, to mere talk, and at best are innocent and pious wishes, fit only to conceal the deception of the masses by the chauvinists. The French social-chauvinists, who are the most adroit and best-versed in methods of parliamentary juggling, have long ago broken the record for incredibly loud and resonant pacifist and internationalist phrases coupled with the most brazen betrayal of socialism and the International, the acceptance of posts in governments engaged in the imperialist war, the voting of credits or loans (as Chkheidze, Skobelev, Tseretelli, and Steklov have been doing recently in Russia) active opposition to the revolutionary struggle in their own country, etc., etc.

Good people often forget the brutal and savage setting of the imperialist World War. This setting does not tolerate phrases, and mocks at innocent and pious wishes.

There is one, and only one, kind of internationalism in deed: working wholeheartedly for the development of the revolutionary movement and the revolutionary struggle in one's own country, and supporting (by propaganda, sympathy and material aid) such, and only such, a struggle and such a line in every country without exception.

Everything else is deception and Manilovism.*

In the course of the two and half years of war the international Socialist and labour movement in every country has evolved three tendencies. Whoever ignores reality and refuses to recognise the existence of these three tendencies, to analyse them, to fight persistently for the tendency that is really internationalist, is doomed to impotence, helplessness and error.

The three tendencies are:

1) The social-chauvinists, i.e., Socialists in word and chauvinists in action, people who are in favour of "national defence" in an imperialist war (and particularly in the present imperialist war).

These people are our class enemies. They have gone over to the bourgeoisie.

They include the majority of the official leaders of the official Social-Democratic parties in all countries—Plekhanov and

Co. in Russia, the Scheidemanns in Germany, Renaudel, Guesde and Sembat in France, Bissolati and Co. in Italy,* Hyndman, the Fabians and the Labourites in England, Branting and Co. in Sweden, Troelstra and his party in Holland, Stauning and his party in Denmark, Victor Berger and the other "defenders of the fatherland" in America and so forth.

2) The second tendency is what is known as the "Centre," consisting of people who vacillate between the social-chauvinists and the true internationalists.

All those who belong to the "Centre" swear that they are Marxists and internationalists, that they are in favour of peace, of bringing every kind of "pressure" to bear upon the governments, of "demanding" that their own governments should "ascertain the will of the people for peace," that they favour all sorts of peace campaigns, that they are for a peace without annexations, etc., etc.—and for peace with the social-chauvinists. The "Centre" is for "unity," the "Centre" is opposed to a split.

The "Centre" is a realm of honeyed petty-bourgeois phrases, of internationalism in word and cowardly opportunism and fawning on the social-chauvinists in deed.

The fact of the matter is that the "Centre" is not convinced of the necessity for a revolution against one's own government; it does not preach revolution; it does not carry on a wholehearted revolutionary struggle; and in order to evade such a struggle it resorts to the tritest ultra-"Marxist" excuses.

The social-chauvinists are our class enemies, the bourgeois within the labour movement. They represent strata, or groups, or sections of the working class which have virtually been bribed by the bourgeoisie (by better wages, positions of honour, etc.), and which help their bourgeoisies to plunder and oppress small and weak peoples and to fight for the division of the capitalist spoils.

The "Centre" consists of routine-worshippers, slaves to rotten legality, corrupted by the atmosphere of parliamentarism, bureaucrats accustomed to snug positions and soft jobs. Historically and economically speaking, they do not represent a separate stratum but are a transition from a past phase of the labour movement—the phase between 1871 and 1914, which gave much that is valuable to the proletariat, particularly in the indispensable art of slow, sustained and systematic organisational work on a very large scale—to a new phase, a phase that became objectively essential with the outbreak of the first imperialist World War, which inaugurated the era of social revolution.

The chief leader and representative of the "Centre" is Karl Kautsky, the most outstanding authority in the Second International (1889-1914). Since August 1914, he has presented a picture of utterly bankrupt Marxism, of unheard-of spinelessness, and a series of the most wretched vacillations and betrayals. This Centrist tendency includes Kautsky, Haase, Ledebour, and the so-called "labour group" (Arbeitsgemeinschaft) in the Reichstag; in France it includes Longuet, Pressemane and the "minoritaires" (Mensheviks) in general; in England, Philip Snowden, Ramsay MacDonald and many other leaders of the Independent Labour Party, and a section of the British Socialist Party; Morris Hillquit and many others in the United States; Turati, Treves, Modigliani and others in Italy; Robert Grimm and others in Switzerland; Victor Adler and Co. in Austria; the party of the Organisation Committee,¹ Axelrod, Martov, Chkheidze, Tseretelli and others in Russia, and so forth.

It goes without saying that at times individual persons unconsciously drift from social-chauvinism to "Centrism," and vice versa. Every Marxist knows, however, that classes are distinct, even though individuals may move freely from one class to another; similarly, currents in political life are distinct, in spite of the fact that individuals drift freely from one current to another, and in spite of all attempts and efforts to amalgamate currents.

3) The third tendency, the true internationalists, is most closely represented by the "Zimmerwald Left." (We reprint as a supplement its manifesto of September 1915, in order that the reader may become acquainted in the original with the inception of this movement.*)

It is characterised mainly by its complete break with both social-chauvinism and "Centrism," and by its relentless war against its own imperialist government and against its own imperialist bourgeoisie. Its principle is: "Our greatest enemy is at home." It wages a ruthless struggle against honeyed social-pacifist phrases (a social-pacifist is a Socialist in words and a bourgeois pacifist in deeds; bourgeois pacifists dream of an everlasting peace without the overthrow of the yoke and domination of capital) and against all subterfuges employed to deny the possibility, the appropriateness, the timeliness of a proletarian revolutionary struggle, of a proletarian socialist revolution in connection with the present war.

¹ I.e., the Mensheviks.—Ed.

The most outstanding representative of this tendency in Germany is the Spartacus Group or the Group of the International, to which Karl Liebknecht belongs. Karl Liebknecht is one of the most celebrated representatives of this tendency and of the new, and genuine, proletarian International.

Karl Liebknecht called upon the workers and soldiers of Germany to turn their guns against their own government. Karl Liebknecht did that openly from the parliamentary tribune (the Reichstag). He then went out to a demonstration on Potsdamer Platz, one of the largest public squares in Berlin, distributing illegally printed proclamations announcing the slogan "Down with the government." He was arrested and sentenced to hard labour. He is now serving his term in a German penal prison, like hundreds, if not thousands, of other genuine German Socialists who have been imprisoned for opposing the war.

Karl Liebknecht in his speeches and letters mercilessly attacked not only the German Plekhanovs and Potresovs (Scheidemann, Legien, David and so forth), but also the German Centrists, the German Chkheidzes and Tseretellis (Kautsky, Haase, Ledebour and Co.).

Karl Liebknecht and his friend, Otto Rühle, two out of one hundred and ten deputies, violated discipline, destroyed the "unity" with the "Centre" and the chauvinists, and went against all of them. Liebknecht alone represents socialism, the proletarian cause, the proletarian revolution. The rest of German Social-Democracy, to quote the apt words of Rosa Luxemburg (also a member and one of the leaders of the Spartacus Group), is a "stinking corpse."

Another group of internationalists in deed in Germany is gathered around the Bremen paper Arbeiterpolitik.

Closest to the internationalists in deed are: in France, Loriot and his friends (Bourderon and Merrheim have degenerated to social-pacifism), as well as the Frenchman, Henri Guilbeaux, who publishes in Switzerland a paper called Demain; in England, the Trade Unionist, and some of the members of the British Socialist Party and of the Independent Labour Party (for instance, Russell Williams, who openly called for a break with the leaders who have betrayed socialism), the Scottish public-school teacher and Socialist, MacLean, who was sentenced to hard labour by the bourgeois government of England for his revolutionary fight against the war, and hundreds of British Socialists who are in jail for the same offence. They, and they alone, are internationalists in deed. In the United States, the Socialist Labour Party and the elements within the opportunist Socialist Party who in January 1917 began the publication of the paper The Internationalist; in Holland, the party of the "Tribunists," who publish the paper Tribune (Pannekoek, Herman Gorter, Wynkoop, and Henrietta Roland-Holst), which, although Centrist at Zimmerwald, has now joined our ranks; in Sweden, the party of the youth, or the Left, led by Lindhagen, Ture Nerman, Carlson, Ström and Z. Höglund, who at Zimmerwald was personally active in the organisation of the Zimmerwald Left, and who is now in prison for his revolutionary fight against the war; in Denmark, Trier and his friends, who have left the now purely bourgeois "Social-Democratic" Party, headed by the minister, Stauning; in Bulgaria, the "Tesniaki"; in Italy, the nearest are Constantino Lazzari, secretary of the party, and Serrati, editor of the central organ, Avanti; in Poland, Karl Radek, Hanecki and other leaders of the Social-Democrats united under the "District Administration," and Rosa Luxemburg, Tyszkó, and the other leaders of the Social-Democrats united under the "Central Administration"; in Switzerland, those Lefts who drew up the argument for the "referendum" (January 1917) directed against the social-chauvinists and the "Centre" of their own country, and who at the Zurich Cantonal Socialist Convention, held at Töss on February 11, 1917, introduced a consistently revolutionary resolution against the war; in Austria, the young Left-Wing friends of Friedrich Adler, who acted partly through the Karl Marx Club in Vienna, now closed by the extremely reactionary Austrian government, which is torturing Adler for his heroic but ill-considered attempt upon the life of a minister, and so on.

We are dealing here not with shades of opinion, which certainly exist even among the Lefts. We have here a tendency. The fact is that it is by no means easy to be an internationalist in deed during a frightful imperialist war. Such people are few; but it is on such people alone that the future of Socialism depends; they alone are the leaders of the masses, and not the corrupters of the masses.

The difference between the reformists and revolutionaries among the Social-Democrats and Socialists generally was objectively bound to undergo a change in the circumstances of an imperialist war. Those who confine themselves to "demanding" that the bourgeois governments should conclude peace or "ascertain the will of the peoples for peace" are virtually reformists. For, objectively, the problem of war can be solved only in a revolutionary way.

There is no way out of this war, no hope of a democratic, non-coercive peace and the liberation of the peoples from the burden of paying billions in interest to the capitalists, who have grown rich by the war, except by a revolution of the proletariat.

The most various reforms can be and must be demanded of the bourgeois governments, but without being guilty of Manilovism and reformism one cannot demand that people and classes who are entangled by the thousand threads of imperialist capital should break those threads. And unless they are broken, all talk of a war against war is idle and deceitful prattle.

The "Kautskians," the "Centre," are revolutionaries in word and reformists in deed; they are internationalists in word and coadjutors of the social-chauvinists in deed.

THE COLLAPSE OF THE ZIMMERWALD INTERNATIONAL—THE NEED FOR A THIRD INTERNATIONAL

17) From the very outset, the Zimmerwald International adopted a vacillating, "Kautskian," "Centrist" position, which immediately compelled the Zimmerwald Left to dissociate itself, to separate itself from the rest, and to issue its own manifesto (published in Switzerland in Russian, German and French).

The chief defect of the Zimmerwald International, and the cause of its collapse (for from a political and ideological point of view it has already collapsed), was its vacillation and indecision on the extremely important question, one of crucial practical significance, the question of breaking completely with the social-chauvinists and the old social-chauvinist International, headed by Vandervelde and Huysmans at the Hague (Holland).

It is not as yet known in Russia that the Zimmerwald majority are really Kautskians. Yet this is an important fact, one which cannot be ignored, and which is now generally known in Western Europe. Even that chauvinist, that extreme German chauvinist, Heilmann, editor of the ultra-chauvinist Chemnitzer Volksstimme and contributor to the ultra-chauvinist Glocke of Parvus (a "Social-Democrat," of course, and an ardent partisan of Social-Democratic "unity"), was compelled to acknowledge in the press that the "Centre," or "Kautskyism," and the Zimmerwald majority are one and the same thing.

This fact was definitely established at the end of 1916 and the beginning of 1917. In spite of the fact that social-pacifism was condemned by the Kienthal Manifesto,* the whole Zimmerwald Right, the entire Zimmerwald majority, sank to social-pacifism: Kautsky and Co. in a series of utterances in January and February 1917; Bourderon and Merrheim, in France, who cast their votes in unanimity with the social-chauvinists for the pacifist resolutions of the Socialist Party (December 1916) and of the Confédération Générale du Travail (the national organisation of the French labour unions, also in December 1916); Turati and Co. in Italy, where the entire party took up a social-pacifist position, while Turati himself, in a speech delivered on December 17, 1916,

"slipped" (not by accident, of course) into nationalist phrases tending to present the imperialist war in a favourable light.

In January 1917, the chairman of the Zimmerwald and Kienthal Conferences, Robert Grimm, joined hands with the social-chauvinists of his own party (Greulich, Pflüger, Gustav Müller and others) against the true internationalists.

At two conferences of Zimmerwaldists of several countries, held in January and February 1917, this equivocal, double-faced behaviour of the Zimmerwald majority was formally stigmatised by the Left internationalists of several countries: by Münzenberg, secretary of the international youth organisation and editor of the excellent internationalist publication, Die Jugendinternationale; by Zinoviev, representative of the Central Committee of our Party; by Karl Radek, of the Polish Social-Democratic Party (the "District Administration") and by Hartstein, a German Social-Democrat and member of the Spartacus Group.

To the Russian proletariat much has been given. Nowhere on earth has the working class yet succeeded in developing as much revolutionary energy as in Russia. But to whom much has been given, of him much is demanded.

The Zimmerwald bog can no longer be tolerated. We must not, for the sake of the Zimmerwald "Kautskians," continue the semi-alliance with the chauvinist International of the Plekhanovs and Scheidemanns. We must break with this International immediately. We must remain in Zimmerwald only for purposes of information.

It is we who must found, and immediately, without delay, a new, revolutionary, proletarian International; or rather, we must not fear to acknowledge publicly that this new International is already established and working.

This is the International of those "internationalists in deed" whom I specifically enumerated above. They alone represent the revolutionary, internationalist masses, they and not the corrupters of the masses.

True, there are few Socialists of that type; but let every Russian worker ask himself how many really conscious revolutionaries there were in Russia on the eve of the February-March Revolution of 1917.

The question is not one of numbers, but of giving correct expression to the ideas and policy of the truly revolutionary proletariat. The essential thing is not to "proclaim" internationalism, but to remain an internationalist in deed, even when times are most trying.

Let us not deceive ourselves with hopes of agreements and international congresses. As long as the imperialist war lasts, international relations will be held in a vice by the military dictatorship of the imperialist bourgeoisie. If even the "republican" Milyukov, who is obliged to tolerate the "parallel government" of the Soviet of Workers' Deputies, did not allow Fritz Platten, the Swiss Socialist, secretary of the party, an internationalist and participant in the Zimmerwald and Kienthal Conferences, to enter Russia in April 1917, although Platten is married to a Russian and was on a visit to his wife's relatives, and although he had taken part in the Revolution of 1905 in Riga, for which he had been confined in a Russian prison, had given bail to the tsarist government for his release and desired to have that bail returned—if the republican Milyukov could do such a thing in April 1917 in Russia, one may judge how much stock may be taken in the promises and offers, phrases and declarations of the bourgeoisie on the subject of peace without annexations, and so on.

And how about the arrest of Trotsky by the British government? How about the refusal to allow Martov to leave Switzerland, and the attempt to lure him to England, where Trotsky's fate awaited him?

Let us harbour no illusions. We must not deceive ourselves.

"To wait" for international congresses or conferences is simply to betray internationalism, since it has been shown that neither Socialists loyal to internationalism nor even their letters are allowed to enter here, even from Stockholm, despite the fact that an absolutely rigorous military censorship can be, and is being, exercised.

Our Party must not "wait," but must immediately found a Third International. Hundreds of Socialists imprisoned in Germany and England will thereupon heave a sigh of relief; thousands and thousands of German workers who are now organising strikes and demonstrations in an attempt to frighten that scoundrel and brigand, Wilhelm, will learn from illegal leaflets of our decision, of our fraternal confidence in Karl Liebknecht, and in him alone, of our decision to fight "revolutionary defencism" right away; they will read and be strengthened in their revolutionary internationalism.

To whom much has been given, of him much is demanded. There is no other land on earth as free as Russia is now. Let us make use of this freedom not to advocate support of the bourgeoisie, of bourgeois "revolutionary defencism," but to organise in a bold, honest, proletarian, Liebknecht way the foundation for a Third International, an International uncompromisingly hostile to the social-chauvinist traitors and to the vacillators of the "Centre."

18) After what has been said, one need not waste many words in explaining that a union of Social-Democrats in Russia is out of the question.

It is better to remain alone, like Liebknecht, and that means remaining with the revolutionary proletariat, than to entertain even for a moment any thought of a union with the party of the Organisation Committee, with Chkheidze and Tseretelli, who can tolerate a bloc with Potresov in Rabochaya Gazeta, who voted for the war loan* in the Executive Committee of the Soviet of Workers' Deputies, and who have degenerated to "revolutionary defencism."

Let the dead bury their dead.

Whoever wants to help the vacillating must first stop vacillating himself.

A SCIENTIFICALLY SOUND NAME FOR OUR PARTY, ONE THAT WILL HELP TO CLARIFY PROLETARIAN CLASS CONSCIOUSNESS

19) I am coming to the last point, the name of our Party. We must call ourselves a Communist Party—just as Marx and Engels called themselves Communists.

We must repeat that we are Marxists and that we take as our basis The Communist Manifesto, which has been perverted and betrayed by the Social-Democrats on two important points: 1) the workers have no country; "national defence" in an imperialist war is a betrayal of socialism; and 2) the Marxist doctrine of the state has been perverted by the Second International.

The term "Social-Democracy" is scientifically incorrect, as Marx frequently pointed out, in particular in the Critique of the Gotha Programme in 1875, and as Engels reaffirmed in a more popular form in 1894.* From capitalism mankind can pass directly only to socialism, i.e., to the social ownership of the means of production and the distribution of products according to the amount of work performed by each individual. Our Party looks farther ahead: socialism is bound to pass gradually into communism, upon the banner of which is inscribed the motto: From each according to his ability, to each according to his needs.

That is my first argument.

Here is the second: the second part of the name of our Party (Social-Democrats) is also scientifically incorrect. Democracy is but one form of the state, whereas we Marxists are opposed to all and every kind of state.

The leaders of the Second International (1889-1914), Messrs. Plekhanov, Kautsky and their like, have vulgarised and perverted Marxism.

The difference between Marxism and anarchism is that Marxism recognises the necessity of the state for the purpose of the transition to socialism; but (and here is where we differ from Kautsky and Co.) not a state of the type of the usual, parliamentary, bourgeois, democratic republic, but a state like the Paris Commune of 1871 and the Soviets of Workers' Deputies of 1905 and 1917.

My third argument: the course of events, the revolution, has already actually established in our country, although in a weak and embryonic form, this new type of "state," which is not a state in the true sense of the word.

This is already a matter of the practical action of the masses and not merely of theories of the leaders.

The state, in the true sense of the term, is the power exercised over the masses by detachments of armed men separated from the people.

Our new state, now in process of being born, is also a state, for we too need detachments of armed men; we too need the strictest order, and must ruthlessly and forcibly crush all attempts at either a tsarist or a Guchkov-bourgeois counter-revolution.

But our new state, now in process of being born, is no longer a state in the true sense of the term, for in many parts of Russia these detachments of armed men are the masses themselves, the entire people, and not merely privileged individuals, placed above and separated from the people, who in practice cannot be removed and replaced.

We must look forward, and not backward to the usual bourgeois type of democracy, which consolidated the rule of the bourgeoisie with the aid of the old, monarchist, organs of government—the police, the army and the bureaucracy.

We must look forward to the new democracy which is in process of being born, and which is already ceasing to be a democracy. For democracy means the rule of the people, whereas the armed people cannot rule over themselves.

The term democracy is not only scientifically incorrect when applied to a Communist Party; it has now, since March 1917, simply become a blinker covering the eyes of the revolutionary people and preventing them from boldly and freely, on their own initiative, building up the new: the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers', and all other Deputies, as the sole power in the state and as the harbinger of the "withering away" of the state in every form.

My fourth argument: we must reckon with the actual situation in which Socialism finds itself internationally.

It is not what it was during the years 1871 to 1914, when Marx and Engels consciously reconciled themselves to the inaccurate, opportunist term "Social-Democracy." For in those days, after the defeat of the Paris Commune, history demanded slow organisational and educational work. Nothing else was possible. The anarchists were then (as they are now) fundamentally wrong not only theoretically, but also economically and politically. The anarchists wrongly estimated the character of the times, for they did not understand the world situation: the worker of England corrupted by imperialist profits; the Commune defeated in Paris; the recent triumph of the bourgeois national movement in Germany,* the age-long sleep of semi-feudal Russia.

Marx and Engels gauged the times accurately; they understood the international situation; they realised that the approach to the beginning of the social revolution must be slow.

We, in our turn, must also understand the peculiarities and the tasks of the new era. Let us not imitate those sorry Marxists of whom Marx said: "I have sown dragons and have gathered a harvest of fleas."

The objective needs of capitalism grown into imperialism brought about the imperialist war. The war has brought mankind to the brink of a precipice, to the destruction of civilisation, to the brutalisation and destruction of countless millions of human beings.

There is no escape except in a proletarian revolution.

And at the very moment when such a revolution begins, when it is taking its first awkward, timorous, uncertain and groping steps, steps betraying too great a confidence in the bourgeoisie, at that moment the majority (that is the truth, that is a fact) of the "Social-Democratic" leaders, of the "Social-Democratic" parliamentarians and of the "Social-Democratic" papers—and these are the organs for influencing the masses—betray socialism and go over to the side of "their" national bourgeoisies.

The masses are confused, they have been put off the track, deceived by these leaders.

And are we to aid and abet that deception by retaining the old and antiquated Party name, which is as decayed as the Second International?

Let it be granted that "many" workers accept Social-Democracy in good faith; but it is time we knew how to distinguish the subjective from the objective.

Subjectively, such Social-Democratic workers are the loyal leaders of the proletarian masses.

Objectively, however, the world situation is such that the old name of our Party makes it easier to fool the masses and impede the onward march; for everywhere, in every paper, in every parliamentary group, the masses see leaders, i.e., the people whose voice carries farthest, whose acts are most prominent; yet they are all "also-Social-Democrats," they are all "for unity" with the betrayers of socialism, with the social-chauvinists; and they are all presenting for payment the old bills issued by "Social-Democracy." . . .

And what are the opposing arguments? We shall be confused with the anarchist-communists, we are told. . . .

Why are we not afraid of being confused with the social-nationalists, the social-liberals, or the radical-socialists, the foremost and most adroit bourgeois party in the French Republic in deceiving the masses?

We are told: The masses have grown used to the name, the workers have learnt to "love" their Social-Democratic Party.

That is the only argument. But it is an argument that disregards the teachings of Marxism, the tasks of the immediate morrow in the revolution, the objective position of world Socialism, the shameful collapse of the Second International, and the injury done to the practical cause by the pack of "also-Social-Democrats" who surround the proletarians.

It is an argument of routine, somnolence, and inertia.

But we are out to rebuild the world. We want to put an end to the imperialist World War, in which hundreds of millions of people and the interests of billions and billions of capital are involved, and which can be ended in a truly democratic peace only by the greatest proletarian revolution in the history of mankind.

Yet we are afraid of our own selves. We are loth to cast off the "dear old" soiled shirt. . . .

But it is time to cast off the soiled shirt and don a clean one.

April 23 (10), 1917

POLITICAL PARTIES IN RUSSIA AND THE TASKS OF THE PROLETARIAT *

THE following is an experiment in formulating, first, the more important questions, but also certain lesser questions, together with their answers, characterising the present situation in Russia and the way it is understood by the various parties.

1) What are the chief groupings of political parties in Russia?

A. (to the Right of the C.D.). The parties and groups to the Right of the Constitutional-Democrats.

B. (C.D.). The Constitutional-Democratic Party (Cadets, or the People's Freedom Party) and kindred groups.

C. (S.D. and S.R.). The Social-Democrats, the Socialist-Revolutionaries and kindred groups.

D. ("Bolsheviks"). The party which properly should be called the Communist Party, but which at present is named the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party united under the Central Committee or, popularly, the "Bolsheviks."

2) What classes do these parties represent? What class standpoint do they express?

A. (to the Right of the C.D.). The feudal landlords and the most backward sections of the bourgeoisie (of the capitalists).

B. (C.D.). The bourgeoisie as a whole, that is, the capitalist class, and the landlords who have become bourgeois, i.e., who have become capitalists.

C. (S.D. and S.R.). Small proprietors, small and middle peasants, the petty bourgeoisie, and that section of the workers which has come under the influence of the bourgeoisie.

D. ("Bolsheviks"). Class conscious proletarians, wage workers and the allied poor section of the peasantry (semi-proletarians).

3) What is their attitude towards socialism?

A. (to the Right of the C.D.) and B. (C.D.). Unconditionally hostile, since socialism threatens the profits of the capitalists and landlords.

C. (S.D. and S.R.). For socialism, but it is too early to think of it or to take any practical measures for its realisation.

D. ("Bolsheviks"). For socialism. The Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies must at once take every practicable and feasible measure for its realisation.¹

4) What form of government do they want at present?

A. (to the Right of the C.D.). A constitutional monarchy, the absolute power of the bureaucracy and the police.

B. (C.D.). A bourgeois parliamentary republic, i.e., the consolidation of the rule of the capitalists, while retaining the old bureaucracy and the police.

C. (S.D. and S.R.). A bourgeois parliamentary republic, with reforms for the workers and peasants.

D. ("Bolsheviks"). A republic of Soviets of Workers', Soldiers', Peasants' and other Deputies. The abolition of the standing army and the police, to be replaced by the universally armed people; officials to be not only elected, but also subject to recall; their pay not to exceed that of a competent worker.

5) What is their attitude towards the restoration of the Romanov monarchy?

A. (to the Right of the C.D.). Favourable; but they act covertly and cautiously, for they are afraid of the people.

B. (C.D.). When the Guchkovs seemed to be a force, the Cadets were in favour of putting a brother or the son of Nicholas on the throne; but when the people began to seem a force, the Cadets became anti-monarchist.

¹ For the nature of these measures, see questions 20 and 22.

C. (S.D. and S.R.) and D. ("Bolsheviks"). Unconditionally opposed to a monarchist restoration in any form.

6) What is their attitude towards the seizure of power? What do they regard as order, and what as anarchy?

A. (to the Right of the C.D.). If a tsar or some dashing general seizes power, that is an act of god, that is order. Everything else is anarchy.

B. (C.D.). If the capitalists seize power, even by force, that is order; to seize power against the capitalists would be anarchy.

C. (S.D. and S.R.). If the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and other Deputies seize power alone, that is a threat of anarchy. For the present, let the capitalists have the power, and the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies have the "Contact Commission." *

D. ("Bolsheviks"). The entire power must be solely in the hands of the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers', Peasants', Agricultural Labourers' and other Deputies. Propaganda, agitation and the organisation of millions upon millions of people must be entirely directed towards this end immediately.¹

7) Should the Provisional Government be supported?

A. (to the Right of the C.D.) and B. (C.D.). Unquestionably, since it is the only government possible at this moment which will protect the interests of the capitalists.

C. (S.D. and S.R.). Yes, but on condition that it carries out its agreement with the Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies and attends the meetings of the Contact Commission.

D. ("Bolsheviks"). No; let the capitalists support it. We must prepare the people for the sovereign and undivided power of the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and other Deputies.

¹ Anarchy is the complete negation of state power, whereas the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies are themselves a state power.

8) For a single power or a dual power?

A. (to the Right of the C.D.). and B. (C.D.). For the sole power of the capitalists and landlords.

C. (S.D. and S.R.). For dual power. The Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies to exercise "control" over the Provisional Government. It is dangerous to reflect as to whether control can be effective without power.

D. ("Bolsheviks"). For the sole power of the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and other Deputies from top to bottom all over the country.

9) Should a Constituent Assembly be summoned?

A. (to the Right of the C.D.). No, for it might injure the landlords. Who knows, the peasants in the Constituent Assembly may decide that the landlords ought to be deprived of their estates.

B. (C.D.). Yes, but without fixing a date. As much time as possible should be spent in consulting with professors of law; for, in the first place, as Bebel said, jurists are the most reactionary people in the world; and, in the second place, the experience of all revolutions has shown that the cause of the freedom of the people is lost when it is entrusted to professors.

C. (S.D. and S.R.). Yes, and as soon as possible. A date must be appointed; we have already said so two hundred times at the meetings of the Contact Commission, and shall say so finally tomorrow, for the two hundred and first time.

D. ("Bolsheviks"). Yes, and as soon as possible. But there is only one way to assure its success and convocation, viz., to increase the number and strengthen the power of the Soviets of Workers', Peasants', and other Deputies, and to organise and arm the working class masses. That is the only guarantee.

10) Does the state need the usual type of police and standing army?

A. (to the Right of the C.D.) and B. (C.D.). They are most certainly necessary, for they are the only firm guarantee of the rule of the capitalists; and, as has been shown by the experience of all countries, they, if necessary, greatly facilitate the return from a republic to a monarchy.

C. (S.D. and S.R.). On the one hand, they are perhaps not necessary. On the other hand, is not so radical a change premature? However, we shall raise the matter in the Contact Commission.

D. ("Bolsheviks"). Absolutely unnecessary. The universal arming of the people must be proceeded with everywhere immediately and unreservedly, and merged with the militia and the army. The capitalists must pay the workers for days served in the militia.

11) Does the state need a bureaucracy of the usual type?

A. (to the Right of the C.D.) and B. (C.D.). Most certainly. Nine-tenths of them are sons and brothers of the landlords and capitalists. They must continue to remain a privileged and, in practice, permanent body of people.

C. (S.D. and S.R.). It is hardly fitting to raise so hastily a question that was raised practically by the Paris Commune.

D. ("Bolsheviks"). Most certainly not. All officials and all and every kind of deputy must be subject not only to election, but also to recall at any time. Their pay must not exceed that of a competent workman. They must be replaced (gradually) by the people's militia and its detachments.

12) Should officers be elected by the soldiers?

A. (to the Right of the C.D.) and B. (C.D.). No. That would be detrimental to the landlords and capitalists. If the soldiers cannot be pacified otherwise, they must be temporarily promised this reform, but it must be withdrawn at the earliest possible moment.

C. (S.D. and S.R.). Yes, they should.

D. ("Bolsheviks"). Not only must they be elected, but every step of every officer and general must be supervised by persons specially elected for the purpose by the soldiers.

13) Is the arbitrary removal of their superiors by the soldiers desirable?

A. (to the Right of the C.D.) and B. (C.D.). Undoubtedly harmful. Guchkov has already forbidden it. He has already threatened to use force. Guchkov must be supported.

C. (S.D. and S.R.). Desirable. But it is not clear whether they should be removed before the matter is taken up with the Contact Commission, or vice versa.

D. ("Bolsheviks"). Desirable and essential in every respect. The soldiers will obey and respect only elected authorities.

14) For or against the present war?

A. (to the Right of the C.D.) and B. (C.D.). Unquestionably for, because it brings untold profits to the capitalists and promises to consolidate their rule by disuniting the workers and setting them against one another. We shall deceive the workers by calling the war a war for national defence, the object of which is to dethrone Wilhelm.

C. (S.D. and S.R.). In general we are opposed to imperialist wars, but we are willing to be fooled, and are prepared to call the support given to an imperialist war waged by the imperialist government of Guchkov, Milyukov and Co. "revolutionary defencism."

D. ("Bolsheviks"). Absolutely against all imperialist wars and all bourgeois governments waging such wars, including our own Provisional Government; absolutely against "revolutionary defencism" in Russia.

15) For or against the predatory international treaties concluded between the tsar, Great Britain, France, etc. (for the strangulation of Persia, the partition of China, Turkey, Austria, etc.)?

A. (to the Right of the C.D.) and B. (C.D.). Absolutely and entirely for. At the same time, we must not publish these treaties, both because Anglo-French imperialist capital and its governments will not permit it, and because Russian capital cannot afford to reveal its shady affairs to the public.

C. (S.D. and S.R.). Against, but we still hope that with the aid of the Contact Commission and a series of "campaigns" among the masses, it may be possible to "influence" the capitalist government.

D. ("Bolsheviks"). Against. The whole point is to enlighten the masses as to the utter hopelessness of expecting anything in this respect from capitalist governments, and as to the necessity of the power being transferred to the proletariat and the poor peasants.

16) For or against annexations?

A. (to the Right of the C.D.) and B. (C.D.). If it is a question of annexations by the German capitalists and their brigand chief, Wilhelm, we are against. If by the British, we are not against, for they are "our" allies. If by our capitalists, who are forcibly retaining within the boundaries of Russia the peoples who were oppressed by the tsar, we are in favour; we do not call that annexation.

C. (S.D. and S.R.). Against annexations, but we still hope it will be possible to obtain even from the capitalist government a promise to renounce annexations.

D. ("Bolsheviks"). Against annexations. All promises on the part of capitalist governments to renounce annexations are a sheer fraud. There is only one method of exposing it, namely, to demand the liberation of the peoples oppressed by one's own capitalists.

17) *For or against the Liberty Loan?*¹

A. (to the Right of the C.D.) and B. (C.D.). Absolutely for, since it facilitates the conduct of the imperialist war, that is, a war to determine which group of capitalists shall rule the world.

C. (S.D. and S.R.). For, since our incorrect stand, "revolutionary defencism," forces us into this patent departure from internationalism.

D. ("Bolsheviks"). Against, for the war is an imperialist war, waged by capitalists, in alliance with capitalists and in the interests of capitalists.

18) For or against the people's will to peace being ascertained by the capitalist government?

¹ See note to p. 72.*—Ed.

A. (to the Right of the C.D.) and B. (C.D.). For, since the experience of the French republican social-chauvinists was an excellent proof that the people can be fooled in this way; we can say anything you like, but in practice we shall hold fast to the spoils seized from the Germans (their colonies), while depriving the German robbers of the spoils they have seized.

C. (S.D. and S.R.). For, since generally we have not yet relinquished a good many of the unfounded hopes placed by the petty bourgeoisie in the capitalists.

D. ("Bolsheviks"). Against, for class conscious workers place no hopes whatever in the capitalists, and it is our task to open the eyes of the masses to the futility of such hopes.

19) Must all monarchies be abolished?

A. (to the Right of the C.D.) and B. (C.D.). No; the British, Italian and Allied monarchies generally must not be abolished, but only the German, Austrian, Turkish, and Bulgarian, since victory over them will multiply our profits.

C. (S.D. and S.R.). A certain "rotation" must be observed, and in any case we should begin with Wilhelm; as to the Allied monarchies, it would be better to wait a bit.

D. ("Bolsheviks"). No rotation can be established for revolutions. We must help only the revolutionaries in deed, to abolish all monarchies in all countries without exception.

20) Shall the peasants seize all the landlords' estates immediately?

A. (to the Right of the C.D.) and B. (C.D.). By no means. We must await the Constituent Assembly. Shingarev has already explained that when the capitalists seize power from the tsar that is a great and glorious revolution; but when the peasants seize the land from the landlords, that is arrogation of power. Conciliation commissions must be appointed on which landlords and peasants shall be equally represented, while the chairmen shall be officials, that is, drawn from the capitalists and landlords.

C. (S.D. and S.R.). Better if the peasants waited for the Constituent Assembly.

D. ("Bolsheviks"). All land must be taken over immediately. Order must be strictly maintained by the Soviets of Peasants' Deputies. The output of bread and meat must be increased, the soldiers better fed. Injury to livestock, implements, etc., must in no case be permitted.

21) Can we leave the disposal of the land and the management of rural affairs generally solely to the Soviets of Peasants' Deputies?

A. (to the Right of the C.D.) and B. (C.D.). The landlords and capitalists are generally opposed to the full and sole power of the Soviets of Peasants' Deputies in the villages; but, if such Soviets are unavoidable, then better confine ourselves to them alone, for rich peasants are also capitalists.

C. (S.D. and S.R.). Better for the present, perhaps, to confine ourselves to the Soviets, although Social-Democrats do not deny "in principle" the necessity of a separate organisation for the agricultural wage workers.

D. ("Bolsheviks"). We must not confine ourselves solely to the general Soviets of Peasants' Deputies, for the wealthy peasants are also capitalists and will always be inclined to injure or deceive the agricultural workers, day labourers, and poor peasants. It is necessary at once to form separate organisations for these latter sections of the rural population, both within the Soviets of Peasants' Deputies and as separate Soviets of deputies from the agricultural workers.

22) Shall the people take over the largest and most powerful capitalist monopolies, the banks, the syndicates of manufacturers, etc.?

A. (to the Right of the C.D.) and B. (C.D.). By no means, since that might injure the landlords and capitalists.

B. (S.D. and S.R.). Generally speaking, we are in favour of transferring such organisations to the entire people, but it is premature to think of or prepare for it just now.

D. ("Bolsheviks"). We must at once prepare the Soviets of Workers' Deputies, the Soviets of Deputies of Bank Employees, etc., to proceed to the adoption of feasible and practicable measures for the merging of all the banks into one single national bank, to be followed by the establishment of the control of the Soviets of Workers' Deputies over the banks and syndicates, and then by their nationalisation, i.e., their transfer to the possession of the whole people.

23) What kind of Socialist International for establishing and effecting the fraternal union of the workers of all countries is now needed by the peoples?

A. (to the Right of the C.D.) and B. (C.D.). Generally speaking, any Socialist International is harmful and dangerous to the capitalists and landlords; but if the German Plekhanov, that is, Scheidemann, comes to an agreement with the Russian Scheidemann, that is, Plekhanov, and if they detect in each other vestiges of a Socialist conscience, then it were perhaps better for us capitalists to hail such an International and to hail Socialists who support their own respective governments.

C. (S.D. and S.R.). We need a Socialist International that will unite everybody: the Scheidemanns, the Plekhanovs and the "Centrists,"* i.e., those who vacillate between social-chauvinism and internationalism. The greater the hotch-potch, the greater the "unity." Long live the great Socialist unity!

D. ("Bolsheviks"). The peoples need only such an International as will unite the real revolutionary workers, who are capable of putting an end to this frightful, criminal slaughter of the peoples and of delivering humanity from the yoke of capital. Only people (groups, parties, etc.) like the German Socialist Karl Liebknecht, now in prison, only people who are resolutely fighting their own government, their own bourgeoisie, their own social-chauvinists, their own "Centre," can and must immediately establish the International which the peoples need.

24) Should fraternisation at the front between soldiers of the belligerent countries be encouraged?

A. (to the Right of the C.D.) and B. (C.D.). No, that is bad for the interests of the landlords and capitalists, since it might accelerate the liberation of humanity from their yoke.

C. (S.D. and S.R.). Yes, it is desirable. But we are not fully convinced that one should proceed to encourage such fraternisation immediately in all the belligerent countries.

D. ("Bolsheviks"). Yes, it is desirable and essential. It is absolutely essential to encourage immediately attempts at fraternisation between the soldiers of both warring groups in all the belligerent countries.

25) What colour flag would best correspond with the nature and character of the various political parties?

A. (to the Right of the C.D.). Black, for they are the real Black Hundreds.

B. (C.D.). Yellow, for that is the international banner of workers who serve capitalism by choice and not by compulsion.

C. (S.D. and S.R.). Pink, for their whole policy is a rose-water one.

D. ("Bolsheviks"). Red, for that is the standard of the international proletarian revolution.

* * *

This pamphlet was written in the middle (at the beginning) of April 1917. To the question whether it is out of date now, after May 19 (6), 1917, after the formation of the "new," the coalition government, my answer is: No, for the Contact Commission has not really disappeared, it has merely moved into another chamber, one it shares in common with the gentlemen of the cabinet. The fact that the Chernovs and the Tseretellis have moved into another chamber has not changed their policy, nor the policy of their parties.

April 1917

REPORT ON THE CURRENT SITUATION

*Delivered at the April Conference of the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party, May 7 (April 24), 1917

COMRADES, a discussion of the present political situation obliges me to cover an exceedingly broad field, which, to my mind, falls into three parts: first, an examination of the political situation here in Russia and our attitude towards the government and towards the existing dual power; secondly, our attitude towards the war; and, thirdly, the present international position of the working class movement, a position which has brought it (all over the world) face to face with a socialist revolution.

Some of the points require, I think, only brief discussion. Besides, I shall submit to you a draft of a resolution covering all these questions; only I must say that, owing to the extreme paucity of forces at our disposal, and owing also to the political crisis prevailing here, in Petrograd, we were unable not only to discuss the resolution, but even to transmit it beforehand to the local organisations. I therefore repeat that these are only tentative drafts, intended to facilitate the labours of the commission and to enable it to concentrate on a few, most essential questions.

I shall begin with the first question. If I am not mistaken, the Moscow Conference adopted the same resolution as the Petrograd City Conference [Voices: "With amendments."]. I have not seen these amendments and am unable to judge. But since the Petrograd resolution was published in Soldatskaya Pravda,¹ I shall take it for granted, if there are no objections, that everybody is acquainted with it. I submit this resolution to the present All-Russian Conference as a draft.

¹ Soldier's Truth—a popular daily paper published in 1917 by the Bolshevik military organisation in Petrograd.—Ed.

The majority of the parties forming the petty-bourgeois bloc that dominates the Petrograd Soviet represent our policy, in distinction to their own, as a policy of hasty measures. The distinguishing feature of our policy is that we demand first and foremost a precise class analysis of the current situation. The fundamental sin of the petty-bourgeois bloc is that its eloquent phrases conceal from the people the true class character of the government.

If the Moscow comrades have any amendments to make, they might read them now.

[Lenin reads the resolution of the Petrograd City Conference on the attitude towards the Provisional Government.]

Whereas:

1) the Provisional Government, in its class character, is the organ of landlord and bourgeois domination;

2) the Provisional Government, and the classes it represents, are indissolubly bound economically and politically to Russian and Anglo-French imperialism;

3) the Provisional Government is not carrying out fully even the programme it has itself announced, and to the extent that it does, it does so only under the pressure of the revolutionary proletariat and partly of the petty bourgeoisie;

4) the forces of the bourgeois and landlord counter-revolution, now in the process of organisation, have already under cover of the Provisional Government and with its obvious connivance launched an attack on revolutionary democracy;

5) the Provisional Government is delaying the appointment of the elections to the Constituent Assembly, is preventing the universal arming of the people, is resisting the transfer of the whole land to the people, is foisting upon the latter the landlords' method of settling the agrarian question, is blocking the introduction of an eight-hour working day, is conniving at the counter-revolutionary propaganda conducted in the army by Guchkov and Co., is organising the commanding officers of the army against the soldiers and so on . . .

I have read the first part of the resolution, which contains a class description of the Provisional Government. The differences between this and the resolution of the Moscow comrades, as far as one can judge from the text of that resolution, are hardly of an essential nature; but a general description of the Provisional Government as counter-revolutionary I would consider incorrect. If we speak generally, we must specify which revolution we mean. It cannot be said of the bourgeois revolution, for that revolution is already completed. It is premature to say it of the proletarianpeasant revolution, for we cannot be sure that the peasants will necessarily go farther than the bourgeoisie. To express confidence in the peasantry, particularly now that they have turned towards imperialism and defensism, i.e., to supporting the war, is in my judgment unsound. At the present moment the peasantry has arrived at several agreements with the Cadets. That is why I regard this point in the resolution of the Moscow comrades as politically incorrect. We want the peasants to go farther than the bourgeoisie, we want them to take the land from the landlords; but at present we can say nothing definite about their future conduct.

We carefully avoid the words "revolutionary democracy." We may use this expression when speaking of a government attack. But at the present moment this phrase covers a huge fraud, for it is very difficult to distinguish the classes that have become blended in this chaos. Our task is to help those who are lagging behind. To us, the Soviets are important not as a form; what is important is the classes the Soviets represent. Protracted work is therefore necessary in order to enlighten the class consciousness of the proletariat. . . .

[Resumes the reading of the resolution.]

6) the government, nevertheless, at the present moment enjoys the confidence of and, to a certain extent, has a direct understanding with the Petrograd Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, which at present represents an undoubted majority of workers and soldiers, i.e., peasants;

7) every step taken by the Provisional Government in the realm of both domestic and foreign policy is bound to open the eyes both of the urban and rural proletarians and semi-proletarians and of wide sections of the petty bourgeoisie to the true nature of this government;

The Conference resolves that:

1) in order to achieve the transfer of the entire state power to the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, or to other bodies directly expressing the will of the people, protracted work is required to enlighten the proletarian class consciousness and to rally the urban and rural proletarians against the vacillations of the petty bourgeoisie; for it is only work of this nature that will assure the successful advance of the whole revolutionary people; that

2) such activity will require that comprehensive work be carried on within the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, that their number be increased, that their power be strengthened and that the proletarian internationalist groups of our Party be consolidated within the Soviets; and that

3) we must more effectively organise our Social-Democratic forces, in order that the new wave of the revolutionary movement may proceed under the banner of revolutionary Social-Democracy.

Here we have the whole crux of our policy. The petty bourgeoisie is at present wavering, and is concealing its wavering by talk of revolutionary democracy. Against these waverings we must put up a proletarian line. The counter-revolutionaries wish to frustrate it by premature action. Our task is to increase the number of Soviets, to strengthen their power and to consolidate our Party.

The Moscow comrades have added the demand for control to Point 3. This control is represented by Chkhaidze, Steklov, Tseretelli, and the other leaders of the petty-bourgeois bloc. Control without power is a sheer empty phrase. Can I control England? You must seize her fleet in order to control her. I can understand the uneducated mass of workers and soldiers naively and unintelligently believing in control. It is sufficient, however, to ponder over the fundamental aspects of control in order to realise that such a belief is a retreat from the basic principles of the class struggle. What is control? If I write a note or a resolution, they will write a counter-resolution. In order to control, one must have power. If this is not understood by the broad masses of the petty-bourgeois bloc, we must have the patience to explain it to them, but under no circumstances must we tell them an untruth. And if I obscure this fundamental condition by the demand for control, I tell an untruth and play into the hands of the capitalists and the imperialists. "You may control me if you please, but I shall have the guns. You can have all the control you like," they say. They know that at the present moment the people cannot be denied. Control without power is a petty-bourgeois phrase that blocks the march and development of the Russian revolution. That is why I object to the third point of the Moscow comrades.

As regards this unique interplay of two powers, in which the Provisional Government, devoid of power, guns, soldiers and armed masses of people, rests on the Soviets, which, trusting so far in promises, are pursuing a policy of backing these promises—if you wish to take part in this game, you will meet with disaster. We must keep out of this game; we shall continue our work of explaining to the proletariat the unsoundness of such a policy, and at every step events will prove that we are right. We are at present in a minority; the masses do not trust us yet. We can wait; they will come over to our side when the government exposes itself. The vacillation of the government may repel them, and they will rush to our side; whereupon, on the strength of the new relation of forces, we shall say: Our time has come.

I now pass to the question of the war; this question united us practically in the stand we took against the loan, the attitude towards which immediately and clearly revealed how the political forces were aligned. As *Rech*¹ stated, everybody except the Yedinstvo is wavering; the whole of the petty-bourgeois mass is for the loan—with reservations.² The capitalists pull a wry face, but they pocket the resolution with a smile, saying: "You may do the talking, but we will do the acting." All over the world those who are now voting for loans are known as social-chauvinists.

I shall proceed to read the resolution on the war. It consists of three parts: first, an analysis of the war from the standpoint of its class significance; secondly, the revolutionary defencism of the masses, something that cannot be found in any country; thirdly, how to end the war.

Many of us, myself included, have had occasion to address the people, particularly the soldiers; and it seems to me that when everything is explained to them from the class point of view, what they are most hazy about in our position is how exactly we intend to end the war, how we consider it possible to end it. The masses are in a maze of misapprehension, there is an absolute lack of understanding of our position and therefore we must here express ourselves in particularly popular language.

[Reads the draft of the resolution on the war.]

The present war is an imperialist war on the part of both groups of belligerent powers, i.e., it is being waged by capitalists for the sake of domination over the world, for the division of the spoils of the capitalists, for profitable markets for finance and bank capital, and for the strangling of weak nationalities.

The transfer of state power in Russia from Nicholas II to the government of Guchkov, Lvov, and others, a government of the landlords and capitalists, did not, and could not, alter this class character and significance of the war in relation to Russia.

The fact that the new government is carrying on the same imperialist, i.e., annexatory and predatory, war was particularly revealed by the following circumstance: the new government not only did not make public the secret treaties concluded between the former Tsar Nicholas II and the capitalist governments of Great Britain, France, etc., but formally endorsed these treaties. This was done without consulting the will of the people and with the obvious purpose of deceiving them, for it is well known that these secret treaties concluded by the late tsar are utterly predatory, promising the Russian capitalists the plunder of China, Persia, Turkey, Austria, etc.

¹ Speech—the Cadet Party newspaper.—Ed.

² See note to p. 72.*—Ed.

For this reason the proletarian party, unless it breaks completely with internationalism, i.e., with the fraternal solidarity of the workers of all lands in their struggle against the yoke of capital, cannot support either the present war, or the present government, or its loans, no matter in what grandiloquent terms these loans may be described.

Nor can any confidence be placed in the promise of the present government to renounce annexations, i.e., the conquest of foreign countries, or to renounce the forcible retention of nationalities within the boundaries of Russia.

For, in the first place, the capitalists, enmeshed by thousands of threads of Russian and Anglo-French bank capital, and engaged in protecting the interests of capital, cannot renounce annexations in the present war without at the same time ceasing to be capitalists, without renouncing the profits on the billions invested in loans, in concessions, in war industries, etc. In the second place, the new government, having renounced annexations in order to deceive the people, declared through the mouth of Milyukov (in Moscow on April 22, 1917) that it does not renounce annexations. Finally, as was exposed by Dyelo Naroda,¹ a newspaper in which the minister Kerensky collaborates, Milyukov has not even sent abroad his statement concerning the renunciation of annexations.

The Conference therefore warns the people against the empty promises of the capitalists and declares that one must strictly distinguish between a verbal renunciation of annexations and a renunciation of annexations in actual fact, i.e., the immediate publication of all the secret predatory treaties and of all documents pertaining to foreign policy, and immediate measures for the complete liberation of the nationalities which the capitalist class, continuing the policy of the former Tsar Nicholas II so disgraceful to our people, is oppressing, keeping forcibly bound to Russia, or maintaining in a state of inequality.

The second half of this part of the resolution deals with the promises made by the government. For Marxists this section is perhaps superfluous, but it is important for the people. We must therefore supplement it by explaining why we have no faith in these promises and why we must not trust the government. The promise of the present government to abandon its imperialist policy deserves no credence. Our line here must not be to say that we demand that the government publish the treaties. That would be a delusion. To demand this of a capitalist government would be equivalent to demanding the exposure of commercial swindling. Since we maintain that it is necessary to renounce annexations and indemnities, we must indicate how this is to be done; and if we are asked who can do it, our answer will be that this measure is essentially a revolutionary one, and that it can be effected only by the revolutionary proletariat. Otherwise these promises are empty promises made by the capitalists in order to lead the people by the nose.

¹ People's Cause—a newspaper published in 1917 by the Central Committee of the Socialist-Revolutionary Party.—Ed.

[Continues reading the draft resolution.]

So-called "revolutionary defencism," which in Russia has infected all the Narodnik parties (Narodni-Socialists, Trudoviki and Socialist-Revolutionaries) and the opportunist party of the Menshevik Social-Democrats (the Organisation Committee, Chkheidze, Tsereteli, etc.), as well as the majority of unaffiliated revolutionaries, in its class character, on the one hand, represents the interests and the standpoint of the petty bourgeoisie, the small proprietors and the wealthy peasants, who, like the capitalists, derive profits from the oppression of weak nations; and, on the other, is a result of the deception practised on the masses by the capitalists, who are withholding from publication the secret treaties and are confining themselves to promises and rhetorical phrases.

We must admit that a very large number of the "revolutionary defencists" are honest, i.e., they really do not desire annexations, conquests and the oppression of weak nations, and are really striving for a democratic and non-oppressive peace between all the belligerent countries. This must be admitted because the class position of the proletarians and the semi-proletarians of town and country (i.e., of people who earn their livelihood wholly or partly by selling their labour power to the capitalists) is such that these classes are not materially interested in the profits of the capitalists.

Therefore the Conference, recognising that concessions to "revolutionary defencism" are absolutely inadmissible and would signify in practice a complete departure from internationalism and socialism, at the same time declares that as long as the Russian capitalists and their Provisional Government confine themselves to threatening violent measures against the people (for instance, Guchkov's notorious decree threatening the soldiers with penalties for the arbitrary removal of superiors), and as long as the capitalists do not actually resort to violence against the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers', Peasants', Agricultural Labourers' and other Deputies, which organise themselves freely and elect and remove all public authorities—so long will our Party preach abstention from violence in general, and combat the profound and fatal error of "revolutionary defencism" exclusively by methods of comradely persuasion and by pointing out the truth that the attitude of uncritical confidence on the part of the masses towards the government of the capitalists, who are the bitterest enemies of peace and socialism, is in Russia today the greatest obstacle to a speedy conclusion of the war.

A section of the petty bourgeoisie is materially interested in the policy of the capitalists—of that there can be no doubt—and therefore the proletarian party can now place no hopes in a community of interests with the peasantry. We are striving to win the peasantry over to our side, but the peasantry to a certain extent consciously sides with the capitalists.

There is no doubt whatever that, as a class, the proletariat and semi-proletariat have no material interest in the war. They are under the influence of tradition and deceit. They still lack political experience. Hence, our task is one of prolonged explanation. We do not make the slightest concession on matters of principle, but we cannot approach them as we approach the social-chauvinists. These elements of the population have never been Socialists, they have not the slightest inkling of socialism and are just awakening to political life. But their class consciousness is growing and broadening with extraordinary rapidity. We must know how to adapt our explanations to them, and that is a most difficult thing, particularly for a party that but yesterday was underground.

Some may ask: Have we not repudiated our own principles? We advocated the transformation of the imperialist war into a civil war—are we not going back on ourselves? But the first civil war in Russia has ended; we are now passing to a second war—a war between imperialism and the armed people. In this transitional period, as long as the armed force is in the hands of the soldiers, as long as Milyukov and Guchkov have not resorted to violence, this civil war, as far as we are concerned, turns into peaceful, prolonged, and patient class propaganda. If we speak of civil war before people have come to realise its necessity, we shall certainly be guilty of Blanquism. We are for civil war, but only when it is waged by a class conscious of itself. Only he who is known to the people as a despot can be overthrown. But there are no despots now: the guns and rifles are in the hands of the soldiers, and not the capitalists; the capitalists are getting their way now not by violence, but by fraud. To cry out against violence now is nonsense. One must be able to regard matters from the Marxist standpoint, which says that the transformation of the imperialist war into a civil war is based on objective and not on subjective factors.

We discard this slogan for the time being, but only for the time being. It is the soldiers and the workers who are in possession of the arms now, not the capitalists. As long as the government has not started war, our propaganda is peaceful.

The government would like the first incautious step towards open action to be made by us, for that would be to its advantage. It is exasperated because our Party has issued the slogan for a peaceful demonstration. We must not cede one iota of our principles to the petty bourgeoisie, who are awaiting developments. No error could be more dangerous for the proletarian party than to base its tactics on subjective desires where organisation is required. We cannot assert that the majority is with us; what is required in this case is mistrust, mistrust and mistrust. To base our proletarian tactics on this is to doom them to failure.

The third point deals with the question of how to end the war. The Marxist point of view is well known; the difficulty is to present it to the masses in the clearest possible form. We are not pacifists and cannot renounce revolutionary war. Wherein does a revolutionary war differ from a capitalist war? Chiefly by the class that has an interest in the war and by the policy that the interested class pursues in the war. . . . When we address the masses, we must give them concrete answers. First, then, how can one distinguish a revolutionary war from a capitalist war? The rank-and-file masses do not grasp the distinction, do not realise that the distinction is one of classes. We must not confine ourselves to theory, but must demonstrate in practice that we can wage a truly revolutionary war only when the proletariat is in power. It seems to me that by putting the matter thus we give a clearer answer to the question of what the nature of the war is and who is waging it.

Pravda has published the draft of a manifesto addressed to the soldiers of all the belligerent countries.* We have information that fraternisation is going on at the front, although still in a more or less haphazard form. What fraternisation lacks is a conscious political idea. The soldiers have come to feel instinctively that action must come from below; the class instinct of people in a revolutionary mood has suggested to them that this is the only true path. But this is not enough for revolution. We wish to give a clear-cut political answer. In order to end the war, the power must pass into the hands of the revolutionary class. I would suggest that an appeal to the soldiers of all the warring countries be drawn up in the name of the Conference and published in all languages. If, instead of the stock phrases regarding peace conferences, 50 per cent of the delegates to which are secret or avowed agents of the imperialist governments, we broadcast this appeal, it will bring us to our goal a thousand times quicker than all these peace conferences. We refuse to have any dealings with the German Plckhanovs. When our train was crossing Germany, these gentlemen, the social-chauvinists, the German Plekhanovs, tried to clamour into our car, but we told them that we would not allow a single Socialist of them to enter our car, and that if they did enter there would be a terrific row. Had a man like Karl Liebknecht been permitted to see us, we should certainly have talked matters over with him. When we issue our manifesto to the toilers of all countries, and in it give a definite answer to the question of how to end the war, when the soldiers read our answer, an answer presenting a political solution to the war, then fraternisation will make a tremendous stride forward. This we must do in order to elevate fraternisation from an instinctive revulsion to the horror of the war to a clear political understanding of how to end it.

I now pass to the third question, i.e., the analysis of the present political situation with reference to the position of the international labour movement and the condition of international capitalism. When discussing imperialism from the point of view of Marxism, it is absurd to dwell on the conditions in one single country, when all the capitalist countries are so closely bound together. And this bond is immeasurably stronger now, during the war. All humanity has been kneaded into one bloody lump, and there is no escaping from it separately. Although there are countries more and less advanced, the present war has bound them all together by so many threads that for any one separate country to try to escape from the tangle is impossible and futile.

We are all agreed that power must be in the hands of the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies. But what will they be able to do, and what ought they to do, if the power passes to them, i.e., into the hands of the proletarians and semi-proletarians? The situation becomes an involved and difficult one. When we speak of the transfer of power, we are confronted with a danger that has played an important part in previous revolutions, namely, that the revolutionary class will not know what to do with the power after it has gained it. History knows many cases of revolutions that collapsed for this reason. The Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, the network of which has spread all over Russia, are now in the centre of the revolution; but it seems to me that we have not sufficiently studied or understood them. If they took the power into their hands, they would not constitute a state in the ordinary sense of the term. The world has never yet seen such a state functioning for any considerable length of time, but the world working class movement has been shaping towards such a state. It would be a state of the type of the Paris Commune. A power of that kind is a dictatorship, i.e., it rests not on law and not on the formal will of the majority, but on direct and open force. Force is the instrument of power. How, then, will the Soviets apply that power? Will they revert to the old method of governing by police? Will they carry on the government by means of the old organs of power? This, in my opinion, they cannot do. At any rate, they will be faced with the direct problem of creating a state that is not a bourgeois state. I have, addressing Bolsheviks, compared this state to the Paris Commune, bearing in mind that the latter destroyed the old organs of government and replaced them by perfectly new ones, which were the direct and immediate organs of the workers. I am blamed for having used at this moment a word that frightens the capitalists exceedingly, for they have begun to interpret it as a desire to introduce socialism immediately. But I used it only in the sense of the replacement of the old organs by new, proletarian organs. Marx regarded that as an enormous advance on the part of the world proletarian movement. The question of the social tasks of the proletariat is for us of tremendous practical importance, first, because we are at the present moment bound up with all the other countries, and it is impossible to free ourselves from this tangle, that is to say, the proletariat will either free itself as a whole or it will be crushed; secondly, the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies are a fact. No one can doubt that they have spread over the whole of Russia, that they are a state power and that there can be no other state power. That being so, we must have a clear conception of how the Soviets are to use that power. It is asserted that this power is the same as that in France or America, but there is nothing like it in these countries; such a direct power does not exist in these countries.

The resolution on the present political situation consists of three parts. The first defines the objective situation created by the imperialist war, the situation into which world capitalism has fallen; the second deals with the condition of the international proletarian movement, and the third with the tasks of the Russian working class, should the power pass into its hands. In the first part I formulate the conclusion that capitalism during the present war has developed beyond its pre-war stage. It now controls whole branches of production. As far back as 1891, i.e., twenty-seven years ago, when the Germans adopted their Erfurt programme, Engels maintained that capitalism could no longer be regarded as planless.* That idea is antiquated; as soon as there are trusts, planlessness ceases. The development of capitalism has made gigantic strides, particularly in the twentieth century, and the war has done more than had been done in twenty-five years. State control of industry has advanced not only in Germany, but also in England. Monopoly in general has evolved into state monopoly. Objective conditions show that the war has accelerated the development of capitalism, which advanced from capitalism to imperialism, from monopoly to state control. All this has brought the socialist revolution nearer and has created the objective conditions for it. Thus the course of the war has brought the socialist revolution nearer.

Before the war England was the freest country in the world—a point always stressed by politicians of the Cadet type. There was freedom in England, because there was no revolutionary movement. But the war immediately changed all that. In a country where for decades there had not been a single instance of an attempt upon the liberty of the Socialist press, a typically tsarist censorship was at once established, and the prisons were filled with Socialists.

During the course of centuries the capitalists of England had learnt to rule the people without the use of force. If they have now resorted to force, it means that they have come to feel that the revolutionary movement is growing and that there is no other course. When we declared that Liebknecht represented the masses, although he was alone and opposed to him were a hundred German Plekhanovs, we were told that this was utopian, that it was an illusion. Yet anyone who attended workingmen's meetings abroad knows that the sympathy of the masses for Liebknecht is an undeniable fact. His bitterest opponents had to dissemble when they faced the masses; if they did not pretend to be his supporters, they at least did not dare to say anything against him. And matters have now gone still further. There are now mass strikes; fraternisation is going on at the front. To indulge in prophecies in this respect would be the height of folly, but that sympathy with the International is growing, that the revolutionary ferment has begun in the German army—these are facts, facts that indicate that the revolution there is maturing.

What, then, are the tasks of the revolutionary proletariat? The main defect and the main error in all Socialist discussions is that the matter is put in too general a form—the transition to socialism. What we should discuss is concrete steps and measures. Some of them are ripe, others are not. We are in a period of transition. We have created forms that patently differ from the forms of bourgeois states. The Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies are a form of state without parallel. This form represents the first steps towards socialism, and is inevitable at the inception of a socialist society. This is a fact of decisive importance. The Russian revolution created the Soviets. No bourgeois country in the world has, or can have, such state institutions, and no socialist revolution can function with any other form of state power. The Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies must take power not for the purpose of creating an ordinary bourgeois republic, nor for the purpose of an immediate transition to socialism. That is impossible. For what purpose, then? They must take power in order to accomplish the first concrete steps towards the transition to socialism, steps that can and must be taken. In a case like this fear is our deadliest enemy. The masses must be taught that these steps must be taken immediately, otherwise the power of the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies becomes devoid of meaning and will give the people nothing.

I shall now attempt to answer the question of what concrete measures we can propose to the people without going contrary to our Marxist convictions.

Why do we desire the transfer of power to the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies?

The first measure the Soviets must accomplish is the nationalisation of the land. It is a measure of which all peoples are speaking. It is said that this is an utterly utopian measure; yet everybody comes to it, for landownership in Russia is so entangled that there is no solution except removing all boundaries and making all the land the property of the state. Private ownership of land must be abolished. This is the task facing us, for the majority of the people are for it. To accomplish this, we need the Soviets. It is a measure that cannot be effected with the aid of the old government bureaucracy.

The second measure. We cannot advocate the "introduction" of socialism—that would be sheer nonsense. We must preach socialism. The majority of the population of Russia consists of peasants, of petty proprietors, who cannot even conceive of socialism. But what objection can they have to there being a bank in every village which would enable them to improve their husbandry? They can have no objection to that. We must preach these practical measures to the peasants and firmly imbue them with the conviction that they are indispensable.

The sugar syndicate is a different matter—that already exists. Our proposal here must be eminently practical. These fully developed syndicates must be handed over to the state. If the Soviets wish to assume power, it must be only for such ends. There is no other reason why they should assume power. The matter may be stated thus: either the Soviets develop, or they die an inglorious death, as was the case with the Paris Commune. If it is a bourgeois republic that is wanted, the Cadets can manage that just as well.

I shall conclude by referring to a speech that made a very strong impression on me. A certain coal miner delivered a remarkable speech, in which, without using a single bookish phrase, he related how they had made the revolution. They were not concerned with the question of whether or not they should have a president. When they seized the mine, the question that interested him was how to keep the cables intact so that production might not be interrupted. Then came the question of bread, which they lacked. Here too they agreed how it was to be obtained. Now, this is a real programme of revolution, not one derived from books. This is the real seizure of power locally.

Nowhere has the bourgeoisie so consolidated itself as in Petrograd. Here the capitalists hold the power. But throughout the country the peasants, without entertaining any socialist plans, are adopting purely practical measures. I consider that this programme of the revolutionary movement alone points the true path of the revolution. These measures, we hold, must be carried out with the greatest caution and circumspection. But only these measures must be carried out; only in their direction must we look. There is no other way. Otherwise, the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies will be dispersed and will perish ingloriously. But if the power is really in the hands of the revolutionary proletariat, it will be solely in order to advance. And to advance means to take concrete measures, and not merely to talk of getting out of the war. The complete success of these measures is possible only provided there is a world revolution, provided the revolution smothers the war and provided the workers of the world support it. Hence, the seizure of power is the only practical measure, it is the only way out.

PART II

INTERNAL PARTY QUESTIONS

MATERIALS RELATING TO THE REVISION OF THE PARTY PROGRAMME *

PREFACE TO THE PAMPHLET "MATERIALS RELATING TO THE REVISION OF THE PARTY PROGRAMME"

THE Central Committee of the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party ("Bolsheviks") has instructed the undersigned ¹ to publish immediately the material at present in the possession of the Central Committee relating to the revision of the Party programme.

This material consists of the following:

a) The initial draft of changes to be made in the theoretical and political parts of the programme, submitted by the present writer to the All-Russian Conference of the R.S.D.L.P. on May 7-12 (April 24-29), 1917, and examined so far only by the commission appointed by the Conference for the detailed elaboration of this question.

b) Comments on the draft, or in connection with the draft, made by the commission or by individual members of the commission.

c) My reply to these comments.

d) A complete draft of proposed changes in the economic minimum programme worked out at the Conference of May 7-12 (April 24-29), 1917, by the sub-commission on the protection of labour.

e) A draft, accompanied by brief explanatory notes, of changes to be made in the clauses of the Party programme dealing with public education. This draft was drawn up by N. K. Krupskaya after the Conference.

I am publishing this material together with brief notes, for I consider that the chief purpose of the Party in publishing this material at present is to secure the active participation of the greatest possible number of comrades in the work of drawing up the Party programme.

¹ I.e., Lenin.—Ed.

The proposed changes above enumerated, taken together, form the draft of the complete text of a new programme. I therefore give at the end of this pamphlet both the old and the new texts of the programme, arranged so as to present the reader with all the material in the form most convenient for comparison and for the insertion of amendments.

Upon the instructions of the Central Committee. I appeal to all comrades, both members of the Party and sympathisers, to give the widest possible publicity to this material in Party publications, to bring it to the attention of every member of the Party, and to address all comments and proposals to the office of Pravda (Moika 32, Petrograd, attention of Central Committee, Material Relating to Programme Revision).

June 2 (May 20), 1917

DRAFT REVISION OF THE THEORETICAL, POLITICAL AND OTHER SECTIONS OF THE PROGRAMME¹

At the end of the preamble to the programme (after the words "the standpoint of the proletariat") insert:

World capitalism has at the present time, i.e., about the beginning of the twentieth century, reached the stage of imperialism. Imperialism, or the epoch of finance capital, represents a high stage of development of the capitalist economic system, one in which monopolist associations of capitalists—syndicates, cartels and trusts—have assumed decisive importance; enormously concentrated banking capital has fused with industrial capital; the export of capital to foreign countries has assumed enormous dimensions; the whole world has been divided up territorially among the richer countries, and the economic partitioning of the world among international trusts has begun.

Imperialist wars, i.e., wars for the mastery of the world, for markets for bank capital and for the strangulation of small and weak nations, are inevitable under such a state of affairs. The first great imperialist war, the war of 1914-17, is precisely such a war.

The extremely high degree of development of world capitalism in general and the substitution of monopoly capitalism for free competition, the fact that the banks and also the capitalist combines have created an apparatus for the social regulation of the process of production and distribution of products, the rise in the cost of living and increased oppression of the working class by the syndicates due to the growth of capitalist monopolies, the enormous obstacles in the path of the economic and political struggle of the proletariat, the horrors of the imperialist war and the disaster and ruin caused by it—all these factors transform the present stage of capitalist development into an era of proletarian socialist revolution.

¹ It will be seen from "The Old and the New Texts of the Programme" given below where each of the amendments and additions proposed by Lenin belongs.—Ed.

That era has begun.

Only a proletarian socialist revolution can lead humanity out of the deadlock created by imperialism and imperialist wars. No matter what difficulties the revolution may have to encounter, and in spite of possible temporary setbacks or waves of counter-revolution, the final victory of the proletariat is inevitable.

Objective conditions make it the urgent task of the present era to prepare the proletariat in every way for the conquest of political power with the purpose of realising the political and economic measures that make up the content of the socialist revolution.

* * *

The fulfilment of this task, which requires the complete confidence, the closest fraternal ties and the direct unity of revolutionary action of the working class of all advanced countries, is impossible without an immediate rupture in principle with the bourgeois perversion of socialism which has gained the upper hand among the leadership of a vast majority of the official Social-Democratic parties. Such a perversion is, on the one hand, the social-chauvinist current, socialism in word and chauvinism in deed, the defence of the predatory interests of one's "own" national bourgeoisie concealed under the slogan of "national defence"; and, on the other hand, the equally wide and international current of the so-called "Centre," which stands for unity with the social-chauvinists and for the preservation or correction of the bankrupt Second International, and which vacillates between social-chauvinism and the revolutionary internationalist struggle of the proletariat for the achievement of a socialist system.

* * *

In the minimum programme, the whole preamble (from the words "On the path" down to §1) should be eliminated, and replaced by the following:

In Russia at the present moment, when the Provisional Government, which is part and parcel of the capitalist class and enjoys the confidence—necessarily unstable—of broad masses of the petty-bourgeois population, has undertaken to convene a Constituent Assembly—the immediate duty of the party of the proletariat is to fight for a system of state organisation which will best guarantee the economic progress and the rights of the people in general, and make possible the least painful transition to socialism in particular.

The party of the proletariat cannot rest content with a bourgeois parliamentary democratic republic, which throughout the world preserves and strives to perpetuate the monarchist instruments for the oppression of the masses, namely, the police, the standing army and the privileged bureaucracy.

The Party fights for a more democratic workers' and peasants' republic, in which the police and the standing army will be completely abolished and replaced by the universally armed people, by a universal militia; all official persons will be not only elective, but also subject to recall at any time upon the demand of a majority of the electors; all official persons, without exception, will be paid at a rate not exceeding the average wage of a competent worker; parliamentary representative institutions will be gradually replaced by Soviets of people's representatives (from various classes and professions, or from various localities), functioning as both legislative and executive bodies.

The constitution of the Russian democratic republic must ensure:

§1. The sovereignty of the people; the supreme power of the state must be vested entirely in the people's representatives, who shall be elected by the people and be subject to recall at any time, and who shall constitute a single popular assembly, a single chamber.

§2. Add:

... Proportional representation at all elections; all delegates and elected officials, without exception, to be subject to recall at any time upon the decision of a majority of their electors.

§3. Add:

... The abolition of all local and provincial authorities appointed by the state.¹

The last sentence in § 8 to read thus:

... The use of the native language in all local public and state institutions; the abolition of an obligatory state language.

§9 to be amended as follows:

The right of all nationalities forming part of the state to freely separate and to form independent states. The republic of the Russian people must attract other nations or peoples not by force, but exclusively by their voluntary consent to the creation of a common state. The unity and fraternal alliance of the workers of all countries cannot be reconciled with the direct or indirect exercise of force against other nationalities.

§11 to read:

Election by the people of judges and other officials, both civil and military, with the right to recall any of them at any time by decision of a majority of their electors.

§12 to read:

Replacement of the police and standing army by the universally armed people; manual and non-manual workers to receive regular wages from the capitalists during time devoted to public service in the national militia.

* * *

¹ See Pravda, No. 68, June 10 (May 28), 1917,* F. Engels' discussion of the Marxist and consistently democratic view on the question of the appointment and confirmation of officials elected by the local population.

After the fiscal section of the programme (following the words "on incomes and inheritances") insert:

The high level of development of capitalism in the banking business and in the trustified branches of industry, on the one hand, and the economic disruption caused by the imperialist war, everywhere provoking a demand for state and public control of the production and distribution of all important products, on the other, prompt the Party to demand the nationalisation of banks, syndicates (trusts), etc.

* * *

The agrarian programme to be formulated thus:

The beginning (from the words "in order to secure the abolition" to the words "Party demands") to be retained; the succeeding sections to be amended as follows:

1) Fights with all its strength for the immediate and complete confiscation of all landed estates (and also appanages, church lands, etc., etc.);

2) Stands for the immediate transfer of all land to the peasantry organised in Soviets of Peasants' Deputies or in other local government bodies elected on a truly democratic basis and completely independent of the landlords and bureaucrats;

3) Demands the nationalisation of all land in the state; while implying the transfer of all property in land to the state, nationalisation entrusts the right of disposal of the land to the local democratic institutions;

4) Upholds the initiative of the peasant committees that, in many localities of Russia, are transferring the livestock and agricultural implements of the landlords to the peasants organised in these committees for the purpose of their socially regulated utilisation in the cultivation of the land.

5) Advises the rural proletarians and semi-proletarians to strive for the formation out of every private estate of a sufficiently large model farm, to be conducted for the public account by the local Soviets of Agricultural Workers under the direction of trained agricultural experts and with the aid of the best technical appliances.

The Party under all circumstances, etc.—to the end of the paragraph ("exploitation").

The conclusion of the agrarian programme, from the words "The Party under all circumstances, and whatever the conditions of democratic agrarian reform may be" to the words "poverty and exploitation" to remain unchanged.

* * *

The whole concluding part of the programme, the last two paragraphs (from the words "In the endeavour to achieve" to the end) to be entirely eliminated.

Beginning of May (end of April) 1917

* * *

CONCERNING THE COMMENTS OF THE COMMISSION OF THE APRIL
ALL-RUSSIAN CONFERENCE*

Regarding the comments on the preamble to the programme, I must say the following.

In my opinion, there is no need for a revision of the entire preamble to the programme. The plan for such a revision proposed by the commission seems to me theoretically incorrect.

In its present form the preamble contains a description and analysis of the most important and essential features of capitalism as a social and economic system. Fundamentally, these features have not been changed by imperialism, the era of finance capital. Imperialism is a continuation of the development of capitalism, its highest stage—in a sense, a transition stage to socialism.

I cannot therefore regard the addition of an analysis of imperialism to the general analysis of the basic features of capitalism as “mechanical.” Imperialism, in fact, does not and cannot transform capitalism from top to bottom. Imperialism complicates and accentuates the contradictions of capitalism, it “entangles” monopoly with free competition, but it cannot abolish exchange, the market, competition, crises, etc.

Imperialism is capitalism which is withering, but not yet withered, dying but not dead. Not pure monopolies, but monopolies in conjunction with exchange, markets, competition, crises—such is the essential feature of imperialism in general.

This is why it is theoretically wrong to delete an analysis of exchange, commodity production, crises, etc., in general and to “replace” it by an analysis of imperialism as a whole. There is no such whole. There is a transition from competition to monopoly, and therefore the programme would be much more correct, and much more true to reality, if it retained the general analysis of exchange, commodity production, crises, etc., and added a characterisation of the growing monopolies. It is, in fact, this combination of antagonistic principles, viz., competition and monopoly, that is the essence of imperialism, it is this that is making for the final crash, i.e., the socialist revolution.

Furthermore, in the case of Russia it would be incorrect to depict imperialism as an integral whole (imperialism in general is a disparate whole), since in Russia there are still many regions and many branches of labour that are in a state of transition from natural or semi-natural economy to capitalism. They are antiquated, they are weak, but, nevertheless, they exist, and under certain circumstances may introduce an element of delay in the collapse of capitalism.

The programme proceeds—as it should proceed—from the simplest to the more complex and “highest” phenomena of capitalism, from exchange to commodity production, to the crowding out of small industries by the larger ones, to crises and so forth, up to imperialism, which is the highest stage of capitalism, only just growing or only just having grown up in the advanced countries. That is how matters stand in actual reality. To begin by placing “exchange” in general and the export of capital side by side is incorrect historically and incorrect theoretically.

Such are my objections to the comments of the commission.

Written in May 1917

* * *

THE OLD AND THE NEW TEXTS OF THE PROGRAMME

For the purpose of an easier and more convenient comparison of the old and the new texts of the programme, both are printed below in the following manner:

The parts of the old programme which remain unchanged in the new are given in ordinary type.

The parts of the old programme which have been completely omitted in the new programme are given in italics.

The parts of the new programme which were not in the old programme are given in bold type.

Programme of the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party

The development of exchange has established such close ties between all the nations of the civilised world that the great movement for the emancipation of the proletariat was bound to become—and has long since become—international.

Russian Social-Democracy regards itself as one of the detachments of the world army of the proletariat, and is striving for the same ultimate goal as the Social-Democrats of other countries. This ultimate goal is determined by the character of modern bourgeois society and by the course of its development. The principal specific feature of such a society is commodity production based on capitalist production relations, under which the most important and considerable part of the means of production and exchange of commodities belongs to a numerically small class of persons while the enormous majority of the population consists of proletarians and semi-proletarians who owing to their economic position are compelled permanently or periodically to sell their labour power, i.e., to hire themselves to the capitalists and to create by their labour the income of the upper classes of society.

The sphere of domination of capitalist production relations is becoming wider and wider as constant technical progress, by increasing the economic importance of big enterprises, leads to the squeezing out of the small independent producers and converts a section of them into proletarians, restricts the role played by the remainder in social and economic life and at times subjects them to the more or less complete, more or less obvious, more or less onerous dependence on capital.

Moreover, this technical progress enables the capitalists to employ female and child labour in the process of production and exchange of commodities to an ever increasing degree. And since, on the other hand, this progress causes a relative decrease in the employers' demand for human labour power, the demand for labour power necessarily lags behind the supply, as a consequence of which the dependence of wage labour on capital is increased and the level of exploitation of labour is raised.

This state of affairs in the bourgeois countries and the constantly growing mutual competition among them in the world market makes it more and more difficult for them to sell the goods which are produced in ever increasing quantities. Overproduction, which manifests itself in more or less acute industrial crises followed by more or less lengthy periods of industrial stagnation, is an inevitable consequence of the development of the productive forces in bourgeois society. Crises and periods of industrial stagnation, in their turn, still further ruin the small producers, still further increase the dependence of wage labour on capital, and lead still more rapidly to the relative and sometimes to the absolute deterioration of the conditions of the working class.

Thus, the improvement in technology, which implies an increase in the productivity of labour and an increase of social wealth, brings about in bourgeois society an increase in social inequality, a greater disparity between rich and poor, a greater precariousness of existence, unemployment and various hardships for ever increasing strata of the toiling masses.

But in proportion to the growth and development of all these contradictions inherent in bourgeois society the discontent of the toiling and exploited masses with the existing order of things grows also, the numerical strength and solidarity of the proletarians increase and their struggle against their exploiters becomes more intense. At the same time, by concentrating the means of production and exchange and socialising the process of labour in capitalist enterprises, the improvement in technology more and more rapidly creates the material possibility of capitalist production relations being superseded by socialist relations, i.e., the possibility of bringing about the social revolution which is the final goal of the entire activity of international Social-Democracy, the conscious exponent of the class movement.

Having substituted the social ownership of the means of production and exchange for private ownership, and having introduced the planned organisation of the social production process in order to ensure the well-being and all-sided development of all the members of society, the proletarian social revolution will abolish the division of society into classes and thereby emancipate the whole of oppressed humanity, for it will put an end to all forms of exploitation of one section of society by another.

A necessary condition for this social revolution is the dictatorship of the proletariat, i.e., the conquest by the proletariat of such political power as will enable it to suppress all resistance on the part of the exploiters. Setting itself the task of making the proletariat capable of performing its great historic mission, international Social-Democracy organises the proletariat into an independent political party opposed to all the bourgeois parties, guides all the manifestations of its class struggle, reveals to it the irreconcilable antagonism between the interests of the exploiters and those of the exploited and explains to the proletariat the historical importance and the necessary conditions for the impending social revolution. At the same time it reveals to all the other toiling and exploited masses the hopelessness of their position in capitalist society and the necessity of a social revolution for the purpose of emancipating themselves from the yoke of capital. The Social-Democratic Party, the party of the working class, calls upon all strata of the toiling and exploited population to join its ranks in so far as they adopt the standpoint of the proletariat.

World capitalism has at the present time, i.e. about the beginning of the twentieth century, reached the stage of imperialism. Imperialism, or the epoch of finance capital, represents a high stage of development of the capitalist economic system, one in which monopolist associations of capitalists—syndicates, cartels and trusts—have assumed decisive importance; enormously concentrated banking capital has fused with industrial capital; the export of capital to foreign countries has assumed enormous dimensions; the whole world has been divided up territorially among the richer countries, and the economic partitioning of the world among international trusts has begun.

Imperialist wars, i.e., wars for the mastery of the world, for markets for bank capital and for the strangulation of small and weak nations, are inevitable under such a state of affairs. The first great imperialist war, the war of 1914-17, is precisely such a war.

The extremely high degree of development of world capitalism in general and the substitution of monopoly capitalism for free competition, the fact that the banks and also the capitalist combines have created an apparatus for the social regulation of the process of production and distribution of products, the rise in the cost of living and increased oppression of the working class by the syndicates due to the growth of capitalist monopolies, the enormous obstacles in the path of the economic and political struggle of the proletriat, the horrors of the imperialist war and the disaster and ruin caused by it—all these factors transform the present stage of capitalist development into an era of proletarian socialist revolution.

That era has begun.

Only a proletarian socialist revolution can lead humanity out of the deadlock created by imperialism and imperialist wars. No matter what difficulties the revolution may have to encounter, and in spite of possible temporary set-backs or waves of counter-revolution, the final victory of the proletariat is inevitable.

Objective conditions make it the urgent task of the present era to prepare the proletariat in every way for the conquest of political power with the purpose of realising the political and economic measures that make up the content of the socialist revolution.

* * *

The fulfilment of this task, which requires the complete confidence, the closest fraternal ties and the direct unity of revolutionary action of the working class of all advanced countries, is impossible without an immediate rupture in principle with the bourgeois perversion of socialism which has gained the upper hand among the leadership of a vast majority of the official Social-Democratic parties. Such a perversion is, on the one hand, the social-chauvinist current, socialism in word and chauvinism in deed, the defence of the predatory interests of one's "own" national bourgeoisie concealed under the slogan of "national defence"; and, on the other hand, the equally wide and international current of the so-called "Centre," which stands for unity with the social-chauvinists and for the preservation or correction of the bankrupt Second International, and which vacillates between social-chauvinism and the revolutionary international struggle of the proletariat for the achievement of a socialist system.

On the path to their common final goal, determined by the fact that the capitalist system of production dominates the whole civilised world, on the path to that goal the Social-Democrats of the various countries are obliged to set themselves varying immediate tasks, both because the capitalist system is not everywhere developed in the same degree, and because in different countries the social and political setting of its development is different.

In Russia, although capitalism has already become the prevailing mode of production, there still remain numerous relics of the former, pre-capitalist system, which was based on the feudal servitude of the toiling masses to the landlords, to the state, or to the head of the state.

Considerably hampering economic progress, these relics also hinder the full development of the class struggle of the proletariat; they help to preserve and intensify the most barbarous forms of exploitation of the vast peasant population on the part of the state and the propertied classes and to keep the people in a state of ignorance and subjection.

The most considerable of these relics of the past, and the most powerful bulwark of this barbarism, is the tsarist autocracy. Its very nature obliges it to be hostile to every social movement and to be the bitterest opponent of every aspiration towards freedom on the part of the proletariat.

By reason of the above, the prime and immediate task which the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party sets itself is to overthrow the tsarist autocracy and to set up a democratic republic in its place, the constitution of which would guarantee the following:

In Russia at the present moment, when the Provisional Government, which is part and parcel of the capitalist class and enjoys the confidence—necessarily unstable—of broad masses of the petty-bourgeois population, has undertaken to convene a Constituent Assembly—the immediate duty of the party of the proletariat is to fight for a system of state organisation which will best guarantee the economic progress and the rights of the people in general, and make possible the least painful transition to socialism in particular.

The party of the proletariat cannot rest content with a bourgeois parliamentary democratic republic, which throughout the world preserves and strives to perpetuate the monarchist instruments for the oppression of the masses, namely, the police, the standing army and the privileged bureaucracy.

The Party fights for a more democratic workers' and peasants' republic, in which the police and the standing army will be completely abolished and replaced by the universally armed people, by a universal militia; all official persons will be not only elective, but also subject to recall at any time upon the demand of a majority of the electors; all official persons, without exception, will be paid at a rate not exceeding the average wage of a competent worker; parliamentary representative institutions will be gradually replaced by Soviets of people's representatives (from various classes and professions, or from various localities), functioning as both legislative and executive bodies.

The constitution of the Russian democratic republic must ensure:

1) The sovereignty of the people; the supreme power of the state must be vested entirely in the people's representatives, who shall be elected by the people and be subject to recall at any time, and who shall constitute a single popular assembly, a single chamber.

1) The sovereignty of the people, i.e., the concentration of the supreme state power in the hands of a legislative assembly, consisting of the representatives of the people and constituting a single chamber.

2) Universal, equal, and direct suffrage for all male and female citizens of twenty years of age or over in all elections to the legislative assembly and to the various local government bodies; secret ballot; the right of every voter to be elected to any representative institution; biennial parliaments; payment of people's representatives; proportional representation at all elections; all delegates and elected officials, without exception, to be subject to recall at any time upon the decision of a majority of their electors.

3) Local government on a wide scale; regional government in all localities where the population is specific in composition and is distinguished by specific social conditions; the abolition of all local and provincial authorities appointed by the state.

4) Inviolability of person and domicile.

5) Unhampered freedom of conscience, speech, press, assembly, strikes and combination.

6) Freedom of movement and occupation.

7) Abolition of the social orders, and equal rights for all citizens irrespective of sex, creed, race, or nationality.

8) The right of the people to receive instruction in their native tongue in schools established at the expense of the state and local government bodies; the right of every citizen to speak at assemblies in his native language; the use of the native language equally with the state language in all local, public, and state institutions; the abolition of an obligatory state language.

9) The right of self-determination for all nationalities forming part of the state.

9) The right of all nationalities forming part of the state to freely separate and to form independent states. The republic of the Russian people must attract other nations or peoples not by force, but exclusively by their voluntary consent to the creation of a common state. The unity and fraternal alliance of the workers of all countries cannot be reconciled with the direct or indirect exercise of force against other nationalities.

10) The right of all persons to sue any official before an ordinary court of jury.

11) Election of judges by the people.

11) Election by the people of judges and other officials, both civil and military, with the right to recall any of them at any time by decision of a majority of their electors.

12) Replacement of the standing army by the universally armed people.

12) Replacement of the police and standing army by the universally armed people; manual and non-manual workers to receive regular wages from the capitalists during time devoted to public service in the national militia.

13) Separation of church from the state, and schools from the church; schools to be absolutely secular.

14) Free and compulsory general and vocational education for all children of both sexes up to the age of sixteen; poor children to be provided with food, clothing, and educational supplies at the expense of the state.

14) Free and compulsory general and technical education (familiarising the student with the theoretical and practical aspects of the most important branches of industry) for all children of both sexes up to the age of sixteen; education to be closely associated with the performance by children of socially productive labour.

15) Students to be provided with food, clothing, and educational supplies at the cost of the state,

16) Education to be entrusted to democratically elected local government bodies; the central government not to be allowed to interfere with the arrangement of the school curriculum, or with the selection of the teaching staffs; teachers to be elected directly by the population itself with the right of the latter to remove undesirable teachers.

As a fundamental condition for the democratisation of the economic life of the state, the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party demands the abolition of all indirect taxes and the establishment of a progressive tax on incomes and inheritances.

The high level of development of capitalism in the banking business and in the trustified branches of industry, on the one hand, and the economic disruption caused by the imperialist war, everywhere provoking a demand for state and public control of the production and distribution of all important products, on the other, prompt the Party to demand the nationalisation of banks, syndicates (trusts), etc.

In order to safeguard the working class against physical and moral deterioration, and in order to ensure the development of its ability to carry on the struggle for emancipation, the Party demands:

1) An eight-hour working day for all wage workers.

1) Limitation of the working day of all wage workers to eight hours, including a break of not less than one hour for meals where work is continuous. In dangerous and unhealthy industries the working day to be reduced to from four to six hours.

2) A weekly uninterrupted rest period of not less than forty-two hours to be established by law for all wage workers of both sexes in all branches of national economy.

3) Complete prohibition of overtime work.

4) Prohibition of night work (from 9 p.m. to 6 a.m.) in all branches of national economy with the exception of those in which it is absolutely necessary on the grounds of technical considerations attested by labour organisations.

4) Prohibition of night work (from 8 p.m. to 6 a.m.) in all branches of national economy with the exception of those in which it is absolutely necessary for technical considerations attested by labour organisations—provided, however, that night work shall not exceed four hours.

5) Prohibition of the employment of children of school age (up to sixteen) and restriction of the working day of adolescents (from sixteen to eighteen) to six hours.

5) Prohibition of the employment of children of school age (up to sixteen), restriction of the working day of adolescents (from sixteen to twenty) to four hours, and prohibition of the employment of adolescents on night work in unhealthy industries and in mines.

6) Prohibition of female labour in branches of industry injurious to the health of women; women to be released from work for four weeks before and six weeks after childbirth, with retention of regular pay during this period.

6) Prohibition of female labour in all branches of industry injurious to the health of women; prohibition of night work for women; women to be released from work eight weeks before and eight weeks after childbirth, with retention of regular pay during this period and the receipt of free medical and pharmaceutical aid.

7) Establishment of nurseries for infants and young children in all works, factories and other enterprises employing women; nursing mothers to be allowed recesses of at least half-hour duration at intervals of not more than three hours.

7) Establishment of nurseries for infants and small children and rooms for nursing mothers in all works, factories and other enterprises employing women; nursing mothers to be allowed recesses of at least half-hour duration at intervals of not more than three hours; nursing mothers to be provided with material assistance and their working day to be limited to six hours.

8) State old age insurance and insurance against total or partial disability, to be covered by a fund formed by a special tax on the capitalists.

8) Full social insurance:

a) for all forms of wage labour;

b) against every kind of disability, e.g., sickness, injury, infirmity, old age, occupational disease, childbirth, widowhood, orphanhood, and also against unemployment.

c) all insurance institutions to be administered entirely by the insured themselves;

d) the expense of insurance to be born by the capitalist;

e) free medical and pharmaceutical treatment under the control of self-governing sick benefit societies, the management bodies of which are to be elected by the workers.

9) Prohibition of wages in kind; establishment of regular weekly pay-days in all labour contracts without exception; wages to be paid in cash and during working hours.

10) Prohibition of deductions by employers from wages on any pretext or for any purpose whatsoever (fines, spoilage, etc.).

11) Appointment of an adequate number of factory inspectors in all branches of national economy; factory inspection to be extended to all enterprises employing hired labour, government enterprises not excepted (domestic service also to be liable to inspection); women inspectors to be appointed in industries employing female labour; representatives elected by the workers and paid by the state to participate in supervising the observance of the factory laws, the fixing of wage scales and the acceptance or rejection of raw materials and finished products.

9) The establishment of a labour inspectorate elected by the workers' organisations and covering all enterprises employing hired labour, as well as domestic servants; women inspectors to be appointed in enterprises employing female labour.

12) Local government bodies, assisted by representatives elected by the workers, to supervise the sanitary conditions of dwellings assigned to workers by employers, as well as the internal regulations in force in such dwellings and the renting conditions, with the purpose of protecting wage workers against the interference of employers with their life and activities as private citizens.

13) Properly organised sanitary control over all undertakings employing hired labour, the medical and sanitary service to be entirely independent of the employers; free medical aid to the workers at the expense of the employers, with full pay during sickness.

14) Employers violating labour protection laws to be liable to criminal prosecution.

10) Sanitary laws for the improvement of hygienic conditions and the protection of the life and health of workers in enterprises employing hired labour; questions of hygiene to be entrusted to a sanitary inspectorate elected by the workers.

11) Housing laws to be enacted and housing inspectors elected by the workers' organisations for the purpose of supervising the sanitary condition of dwelling houses. However, only by the abolition of private ownership in land and the erection of cheap and hygienic dwellings can the housing problem be solved.

12) Industrial courts in all branches of national economy.

15) Industrial courts in all branches of national economy, composed of equal numbers of representatives from the workers' and employers' organisations.

16) Establishment of employment bureaus (labour exchanges) by local government bodies in all branches of industry for the hire of local and non-local workers; representatives of the workers and employers to participate in their administration.

13) Establishment of labour exchanges for the proper organisation of the placing of unemployed workers. The labour exchanges must be proletarian class organisations (and not organised on a parity basis), and must be closely associated with the trade unions and other working class organisations and financed by local government bodies.

In order to secure the abolition of the relics of serfdom, which constitute a direct and heavy burden on the peasants, and in order to encourage the development of the class struggle in the countryside, the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party demands:

1) The abolition of all restrictions upon the person and property of peasants arising out of the system of social orders.

2) The abolition of all payments and duties imposed upon the peasants as a social order, and the cancellation of all debts of a usurious character.

3) The confiscation of church lands, monastery lands, and appanage and tsar's lands and their transfer (together with state lands) to the control of the higher local government bodies embracing urban and rural districts; lands required for the migration fund, and also forests and waters of state importance, to be transferred to the democratic state.

4) The confiscation of private lands, with the exception of small land holdings, and their transfer to the control of the higher democratically elected local government bodies. The minimum size of estates liable to confiscation to be determined by the higher local government bodies. While supporting all revolutionary action on the part of the peasantry, including the confiscation of the large estates of the landlords, the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party is absolutely opposed to all attempts to hinder the course of economic development. While striving for the transfer of confiscated lands to the democratic local government bodies in the event of a victorious development of the revolution, the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party will, if circumstances prove unfavourable for such a transfer, declare itself in favour of dividing among the peasants landed estates on which small husbandry had previously been conducted or which are required in order to round out the peasants' holdings.

1) Fights with all its strength for the immediate and complete confiscation of all landed estates (and also appanages, church lands, etc., etc.);

2) Stands for the immediate transfer of all land to the peasantry organised in Soviets of Peasants' Deputies, or in other local government bodies, elected on a truly democratic basis and completely independent of the landlords and bureaucrats;

3) Demands the nationalisation of all land in the state; while implying the transfer of all property in land to the state, nationalisation entrusts the right of disposal of the land to the local democratic institutions;

4) Upholds the initiative of the peasant committees that, in many localities of Russia, are transferring the livestock and agricultural implements of the landlords to the peasants organised in these committees for the purpose of their socially regulated utilisation in the cultivation of the land;

5) Advises the rural proletarians and semi-proletarians to strive for the formation out of every private estate of a sufficiently large model farm, to be conducted for the public account by the local Soviets of Agricultural Workers under the direction of trained agricultural experts and with the aid of the best technical appliances.

Furthermore, the Party under all circumstances, and whatever the conditions of democratic agrarian reform may be, will unswervingly strive for the independent class organisation of the rural proletariat, will explain to the latter the irreconcilability of its interests with the interests of the peasant bourgeoisie, will warn it against the seduction of small husbandry, which, while commodity production exists, can never do away with the poverty of the masses, and, finally, will point out the necessity for a complete socialist revolution as the only means of abolishing poverty and exploitation.

In the endeavour to achieve its immediate aims, the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party supports all oppositional and revolutionary movements directed against the existing social and political system in Russia, but at the same time vigorously repudiates all reformist projects providing for the extension or consolidation of the guardianship of the police and bureaucracy over the labouring classes.

For its part, the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party is firmly convinced that a complete, consistent and enduring realisation of the political and social reforms indicated can be achieved only by the overthrow of the autocracy and by the convocation of a Constituent Assembly freely elected by the entire people.

May 1917

THE PROBLEM OF UNITING THE INTERNATIONALISTS*

THE All-Russian Conference of our Party passed a resolution recognising the necessity for closer relations and amalgamation with the groups and tendencies which stand for internationalism in practice, on the basis of a repudiation of the policy of petty-bourgeois betrayal of socialism.

The question of unity was also recently discussed at a conference of the Inter-Regional Organisation of the United Social-Democrats of Petrograd.

In compliance with the decision of the All-Russian Conference, the Central Committee of our Party, recognising the extreme desirability of union with the Inter-Regional Organisation, advanced the following proposals (they were first made to the Inter-Regional Organisation only in the name of Comrade Lenin and a few other members of the Central Committee, but were subsequently approved by the majority of the members of the Central Committee):

"Unity is desirable immediately. It will be proposed to the Central Committee of the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party that a representative of the Inter-Regional Organisation be included on the staff of each of the two papers (the present Pravda, which is to be converted into an All-Russian popular newspaper, and the central organ to be established in the near future).

"It will be proposed to the Central Committee to set up an Organisation Commission for the purpose of summoning a Party Congress (within the next one and a half months).

"The Inter-Regional Conference will be entitled to appoint two delegates to this commission. If the Mensheviks who follow Martov break with the 'defencists,' it would be desirable and indispensable to include their delegates on the above-mentioned commission.

"Free discussion of controversial questions shall be ensured by the publication of discussion sheets in Priboy and by free discussion in the periodical Prosveshchenie, publication of which is being resumed." (Kommunist. A draft read by N. Lenin on May 23 [10], 1917, in his own name and in the name of several members of the Central Committee.)

The Inter-Regional Organisation, for their part, passed a resolution which reads:

"Concerning unity. Realising that only by the closest consolidation of all revolutionary forces of the proletariat

"1) can it become the foremost fighter in clearing the way for socialism;

"2) will it be able to become the leader of Russian democracy in its struggle against the survivals of the semi-feudal regime and the heritage of tsarism;

"3) will it be possible to bring the revolution to a decisive conclusion and finally settle the questions of war and peace, the confiscation of the land, an eight-hour working day, etc.;

"the Conference is of the opinion

"a) that a consolidation of forces, so indispensable to the proletariat, can be achieved only under the banner of Zimmerwald and Kienthal, and the programme and decisions of the Party of the years 1908 and 1910, 1912 and 1913;*

"b) that not a single workers' organisation, be it a trade union, educational club, or consumers' co-operative, and not a single labour newspaper or periodical should refrain from enlisting under that banner;

"c) at the same time, the Conference declares itself to be decidedly and ardently in favour of unity on the basis of the resolutions indicated."

Which resolution is most likely to lead to unity is a question for all internationalist workers to discuss and decide.

The political resolutions of the Inter-Regional Organisation have in general adopted the sound course of breaking with the "defencists."

Under the circumstances, any division of forces would, in our opinion, be utterly unjustifiable.

May 31 (18), 1917

PART III

THE PROLETARIAT AND THE PARTY ON THE ROAD TO OCTOBER

LESSONS OF THE CRISIS *

PETROGRAD, and the whole of Russia, have passed through a serious political crisis, the first political crisis since the revolution.

On May 1 (April 18) the Provisional Government issued its notorious note, in which the predatory aims of the war were confirmed with such clarity as to arouse the indignation of the masses, who had honestly believed in the desire (and ability) of the capitalists to "renounce annexations." On May 3-4 (April 20-21) Petrograd was in a ferment. The streets were filled with people; groups, crowds and meetings of various sizes assembled everywhere, day and night; mass manifestations and demonstrations proceeded uninterruptedly. Yesterday, May 4 (April 21), the crisis, or, at any rate, the first stage of the crisis, apparently came to an end: the Executive Committee of the Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, and later the Soviet itself, declared the "explanations," the amendments to the note and the "elucidations" made by the government (empty phrases, which said absolutely nothing, changed nothing and committed it to nothing) to be satisfactory, and regarded the "incident" as "closed."

Whether the masses regard the "incident" as "closed," the future will show. Our duty now is to make a careful examination of the forces, the classes, that revealed themselves in the crisis, and to draw the necessary conclusions in the interests of the party of the proletariat. For it is the great merit of all crises that they reveal what is hidden, cast aside all that is conventional, superficial and petty, sweep away the political garbage and expose the real main-springs of the class struggle.

As a matter of fact, on May 1 (April 18) the capitalist government merely reiterated its previous notes, in which the imperialist war was enveloped in diplomatic equivocations. The soldier masses were aroused to indignation, because they had honestly believed in the sincerity and the pacific intentions of the capitalists. The demonstrations began as soldiers' demonstrations, under the self-contradictory, unenlightened and useless slogan, "Down with Milyukov" (as though a change of persons or cliques can change the essence of politics!).

This meant that the wide, unstable and vacillating mass, which is most closely associated with the peasantry and which by its scientific class definition is petty-bourgeois, swung away from the capitalists towards the revolutionary workers. It was this fluctuation, or movement, of a mass the strength of which is capable of deciding everything that created the crisis.

Thereupon not the middle but the extreme elements, not the intermediary petty-bourgeois mass but the bourgeoisie and the proletariat, began to stir, come out on to the streets, and organise.

The bourgeoisie seized the Nevsky Prospect—or the "Milyukov" Prospect, as one paper calls it—and the adjacent quarters of prosperous Petrograd, bureaucratic and capitalist Petrograd. Officers, students and "the middle classes" demonstrated in favour of the Provisional Government. Among the slogans on the banners one often saw the inscription, "Down with Lenin."

The proletariat rose in its own districts, the workers' suburbs, organised around the slogans and watchwords of the Central Committee of our Party. On May 3-4 (April 20-21) the Central Committee adopted resolutions, which through the apparatus of the organisation were immediately passed on to the proletarian masses. The workers' processions filled the poor and less central sections of the city, but later in groups penetrated to the Nevsky. By their mass character and solidarity, the proletarian demonstrations offered a sharp contrast to those of the bourgeoisie. Among the banners one noted the inscription, "All Power to the Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies."

On the Nevsky a collision took place. The "hostile" processions tore each other's banners. The Executive Committee was informed on the telephone from various parts that there was shooting on both sides, that there were killed and wounded; but the information was extremely contradictory and lacked confirmation.

By shouting about the "spectre of civil war," the bourgeoisie betrayed its fear that the real masses, the actual majority of the people, might seize power. The petty-bourgeois leaders of the Soviet, the Mensheviks and Narodniki, who since the revolution, and particularly during the crisis, have had no definite party policy, allowed themselves to be intimidated. In the Executive Committee, in which on the eve of the crisis almost half the votes were cast against the Provisional Government, thirty-four votes (as against nineteen) were now cast in favour of returning to a policy of confidence in and agreement with the capitalists.

The "incident" is regarded as "closed."

What is the essence of the class struggle? The capitalists are in favour of continuing the war, and of concealing the fact by phrases and promises. They have become entangled in the network of Russian, Anglo-French and American bank capital. The proletariat, as represented by its class conscious vanguard, stands for the transfer of power to the revolutionary class, the working class and the semi-proletarians, for the development of a world-wide workers' revolution, which is clearly rising also in Germany, and for terminating the war by means of such a revolution.

The broad masses, predominantly petty-bourgeois, who still believe the Narodnik and Menshevik leaders, these masses, who have been thoroughly intimidated by the bourgeoisie and are carrying out its policy, although with certain reservations, swing now to the Right, now to the Left.

The war is terrible; it is the masses that are feeling it most keenly; it is among them that the conviction is growing, although not yet very clearly, that the war is criminal, that it is being waged because of the rivalry and the scramble of the capitalists for the division of their spoils. The world situation is growing more and more involved. There is no escape except by a world proletarian revolution, which at present is most advanced in Russia, but which is obviously developing (strikes, fraternisation) in Germany too. And the masses are vacillating: they are vacillating between faith in their old masters, the capitalists, and bitterness towards them; between faith in the new class, the only consistently revolutionary class, which opens the prospect of a bright future for all who toil—the proletariat—and a vague understanding of its world-wide and historical role.

This is not the first and not the last time the petty-bourgeois and the semi-proletarian masses will vacillate!

The lesson is clear, comrade-workers! Time will not wait. The first crisis will be followed by others. All your efforts must be devoted to enlightening the backward, to creating mass, comradely and direct contact (not only by meetings) with every regiment and with every group of still unenlightened toilers. All your strength must be devoted to consolidating your own forces, to organising the workers from the ground up, embracing every borough, every factory, every quarter of the capital and its suburbs! Do not be misled by the petty-bourgeois “compromisers” with the capitalists, by the defencists and by the “supporters,” nor by individuals who are inclined to be in a hurry and to shout, “Down with the Provisional Government!” before the majority of the people are firmly united. The crisis cannot be overcome by violence exercised by certain individuals against others, by the partial action of small groups of armed people, by Blanquist attempts to “seize power,” to “arrest” the Provisional Government, etc.

The watchword for today is to explain more carefully, more clearly, more widely the proletarian policy, the proletarian way of terminating the war. Rally more resolutely, more widely, more universally, to the ranks and columns of the proletariat! Rally around your Soviets; and within them by comradely suasion and by new elections in the case of individual members endeavour to rally around yourselves a majority of the Soviets!

May 6 (April 23), 1917

THE "CRISIS OF POWER" *

ALL Russia still remembers the days of May 2-4 (April 19-21), when civil war was on the verge of breaking out in the streets of Petrograd.

On May 4 (April 21) the Provisional Government wrote a new document,¹ "explaining" away the predatory character of the note of May 1, and intended to have a pacifying effect.

Thereupon a majority of the Executive Committee of the Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies decided to regard the "incident" as "closed."

But a couple of days later the question of a coalition cabinet arose. The Executive Committee was almost equally divided: twenty-three voted against a coalition cabinet and twenty-two for. The incident proved to have been "closed" only on paper.

Another two days pass and we have a new "incident." The Minister for War, Guchkov, one of the leaders of the Provisional Government, has resigned. There are rumours that the resignation of the whole Provisional Government has been decided on. (At the time of writing it is not certain whether the whole government has resigned.) Thus, we have a fresh "incident," one before which all previous "incidents" pale.

Whence this multiplicity of "incidents"? Is there not a fundamental cause that inevitably gives rise to "incident" after "incident"?

Yes, there is such a cause. It is what is known as the dual power, that unstable equilibrium resulting from the agreement between the Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies and the Provisional Government.

The Provisional Government is a government of the capitalists.

¹ See note to p. 129.*—Ed.

It cannot renounce its strivings for conquest (annexations), it cannot end the predatory war by a democratic peace, it cannot but protect the profits of its own class (the capitalist class), it cannot but protect the estates of the landlords.

The Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies represents other classes. The majority of the workers and soldiers in the Soviet do not want a predatory war, they are not interested in the profits of the capitalists and in preserving the privileges of the landlords. Nevertheless, they still have faith in the Provisional Government of the capitalists, they desire to come to an agreement with it, to be in contact with it.

The Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies are themselves the embryo of a power. Side by side with the Provisional Government, the Soviets likewise endeavour in certain cases to assert their power. There is thus an overlapping of powers, or, as it is now called, a "crisis of power."

This cannot continue for long. Under such a state of affairs new "incidents" and fresh complications are bound to arise every day. It is easy to write on paper: "The incident is closed." But in real life these incidents will not vanish—and for the very simple reason that they are not "incidents," not chance happenings and not trifles. They are the external manifestation of a profound internal crisis. They are consequences of the fact that humanity is in a blind alley. There can be no escape from this rapacious war unless we make up our minds to adopt the measures proposed by the Socialist-Internationalists.¹

Three ways of ending this "crisis of power" are being proposed to the Russian people. Some say: Leave things as they are and place ever greater confidence in the Provisional Government. It is possible that they are threatening to resign in order to compel the Soviets to say: We shall trust you still more. The Provisional Government wants to be implored: Come and rule us; whom have we but you? . . .

Another way is a coalition cabinet. Let us share the ministerial portfolios with Milyukov and his friends, they say, let us get a few of our own people into the cabinet; then we shall hear a different tune.

¹ Socialist-Internationalists.—Lenin is referring to the Bolsheviks.—Ed.

The third way is the one we propose: The entire policy of the Soviets must be changed, no confidence must be placed in the capitalists, and the entire power must be transferred to the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies. A change of individuals will lead nowhere; the policy must be changed. The power of government must be assumed by another class. A government of workers and soldiers will earn the confidence of the whole world, for it is obvious to all that the workers and poor peasants desire to rob nobody. That alone can hasten the end of the war, that alone can help us to recover from economic ruin.

All power to the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies!
No confidence in the government of the capitalists!

Every "incident," every day, every hour will corroborate the correctness of this slogan.

May 15 (2), 1917

ON THE EVE *

THE "compromise" machine is working at full speed. The Narodniki and the Mensheviks are toiling in the sweat of their brow to compile a list of ministers. We are on the eve of a "new" cabinet. . . .

Alas! There will be very little that is new in it. To the government of the capitalists there will be added an appendage of petty-bourgeois ministers, Narodniki and Mensheviks who have allowed themselves to be lured into supporting the imperialist war.

More phrases, more fireworks, magnificent promises, more jabber about a "peace without annexations"—and an utter lack of decision, even in the matter of enumerating precisely, directly and honestly the actual annexations of, say, three countries: Germany, Russia and England.

Deceiving yourselves with the utopian belief that the peasants will support the capitalists (prosperous peasants are not the whole peasantry. . . .), with a utopian "offensive" at the front (in the name of "a peace without annexations". . .)—can that last long, citizens of the old and the new cabinets?

May 18 (5), 1917

CLASS COLLABORATION WITH CAPITAL, OR A CLASS WAR AGAINST CAPITAL?¹

THAT is the way history puts the question; and not history in general, but the economic and political history of the Russia of today.

The Narodniki and the Mensheviks, Chernov and Tseretelli, have transferred the Contact Commission from the room adjoining (the one in which the ministers used to meet) to the ministerial chamber itself. This, and this alone, is the pure political significance of the "new" cabinet.

Its economic and class significance is that, at the best (from the point of view of the stability of the cabinet and the preservation of capitalist domination), the upper strata of the peasant bourgeoisie, headed since 1906 by Peshekhonov, and the petty-bourgeois "leaders" of the Menshevik workers have promised the capitalists their class collaboration. (At the worst—for the capitalists—the whole change has a purely personal or clique significance, and no class significance whatsoever.)

Let us assume that the more favourable eventuality is the case. Even so, there can be not a shadow of doubt that the promisers will be unable to fulfil their promises. "We shall—in conjunction with the capitalists—help to bring the country out of the crisis, to avert its ruin and save it from the war"—that is the real meaning of the fact that the leaders of the petty bourgeoisie, the Chernovs and Tseretellis, have joined the cabinet. Our answer is: Your help is not enough. The crisis has advanced infinitely farther than you imagine. Only the revolutionary class, by taking revolutionary measures against capital, can save the country—and not our country alone.

¹ See note to p. 136.*—Ed.

The crisis is so profound, so widely ramified, so world-wide, so closely bound up with capital itself, that the class struggle against capital must inevitably assume the form of the political domination of the proletariat and semi-proletariat. There is no other way.

You want revolutionary enthusiasm in the army, Citizens Chernov and Tseretelli? But you cannot arouse it, for the revolutionary enthusiasm of the masses is not aroused by a change of "leaders" in cabinets, by florid declarations, or by promises to take measures for the revision of the treaty with the British capitalists; it can be aroused only by acts of revolutionary policy patent to all and undertaken daily and everywhere against the omnipotence of capital and against its deriving profits from the war, a policy that will make for a radical improvement in the standard of living of the improverished masses.

Even if you were to hand over all the land to the people immediately, it would not end the crisis unless revolutionary measures were resorted to against capital.

You want an offensive, Citizens Chernov and Tseretelli? But you cannot rouse the army to an offensive, for at present you cannot use force against the people. And unless force is used against the people, they will undertake an offensive only in the great interests of the great revolution against capital in all countries; and not merely a revolution promised and proclaimed, but a revolution actually in process of realisation, a revolution which is being carried out in actual fact, a revolution obvious and tangible for all.

You want to organise supply, Citizens Peshekhonovs and Skobelevs, the supply of the peasants with goods, the army with bread and meat, industry with raw material, and so forth? You want control over, and partly even the organisation of, production?

You cannot accomplish that without the revolutionary enthusiasm of the proletarians and semi-proletarians. And such enthusiasm can be aroused only by taking revolutionary measures against the privileges and profits of capital. Unless such measures are taken, your promised control will remain a dead, capitalist, bureaucratic half-measure.

The experiment of class collaboration with capital is now being conducted by the Chernovs and Tseretellis, and by certain sections of the petty bourgeoisie, on a new, gigantic, all-Russian national scale.

All the more valuable will be its lessons for the people, when the latter become convinced—and that apparently will be soon—of the futility and hopelessness of such collaboration.

May 19 (6), 1917

RUIN IS THREATENING *

NEWS, arguments, apprehensions, rumours of an imminent catastrophe are becoming more and more frequent. The capitalist newspapers are trying to frighten the people; they are foaming at the mouth against the Bolsheviks and making play of Kutler's anonymous references to "a certain" factory, to "certain" factories, to "certain" enterprises, and so forth. Remarkable methods, strange "proofs" indeed. . . . Why do they not name a definite factory? Why do they not afford the public and the workers the opportunity of verifying these rumours, which are deliberately calculated to arouse alarm?

It should not be difficult for the capitalists to understand that unless they present definite facts, name definite factories, they are only making themselves ridiculous. Why, you are the government, Messieurs the capitalists, ten out of the sixteen ministers are yours, you bear the responsibility, you are the masters of the situation. Is it not ridiculous that those who have a majority in the government and are the masters of the situation should confine themselves to Kutler's anonymous references, should be afraid to come out openly and straightforwardly, and should try to shift responsibility to other parties that are not at the helm of the state?

The newspapers of the petty-bourgeois parties, of the Narodniki and the Mensheviks, are also complaining, but in a somewhat different tone. They do not so much level accusations against the terrible Bolsheviks (although, of course, they cannot leave them alone entirely) as heap one good wish upon another. Izvestiya, the editorship of which is controlled by a bloc of the two above-named parties, is characteristic in this respect. No. 63, of May 24 (11), contains two articles on combating economic chaos. The articles are identical in character. One of them has an extremely—how can I put it mildly?—incautious heading (quite as incautious as the entrance of the Narodniki and Mensheviks into the imperialist cabinet generally): "What Does the Provisional Government Want?" * It would be more correct to say: "What the Provisional Government Does Not Want and What It Promises."

The second article consists of a "resolution of the Economic Section of the Executive Committee of the Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies." Here are a few quotations which will best give an idea of its contents:

"Many branches of industry are ripe for a state trade monopoly (bread, meat, salt, leather); others are ripe for organisation into trusts regulated by the state (coal and oil, metallurgy, sugar, paper); and, finally, present conditions demand in the case of nearly all branches of industry state regulation of the distribution of raw materials and finished products, as well as the fixing of prices. . . . Simultaneously, it is necessary to place all banking institutions under state and public control, with the object of combating speculation in goods subject to state regulation. . . . At the same time, the most energetic measures must be taken to combat parasitism, even to the extent of introducing labour service. . . . The country is already in a state of catastrophe, and the only thing that can save it is the creative effort of the entire people headed by a government which has consciously assumed [hem, hem!] the grandiose task of salvaging a country ruined by war and the tsarist regime."

With the exception of the last phrase, beginning with the words we have italicised, which, with purely philistine gullibility, has the capitalists "assume" tasks they are incapable of fulfilling, the programme is an excellent one. Here we have control, state trusts, a fight against speculation, labour conscription—for mercy's sake, where does this differ from terrible Bolshevism, what more do the terrible Bolsheviks want?

That is just the point, that is the whole gist of the matter, that is precisely what the good burghers and philistines of all shades stubbornly refuse to see. They are forced to recognise the terrible Bolshevik programme, because no other programme offers an escape from the truly terrible catastrophe which is indeed impending. But the capitalists "recognise" this programme (see the famous third paragraph of the declaration of the "new" Provisional Government) in order not to carry it out. And the Narodniki and the Mensheviks trust the capitalists, and teach the people to share this fatal trust. That is the whole essence of the political situation.

Control over the trusts, publication of their full reports, immediat conferences of their employees, the unconditional participation of the workers in the control of the affairs of the trusts, independent control on the part of representatives of every important political party—all this can be effected by a decree requiring but a single day to draft.

What, then, is the hindrance, Citizens Shingarev, Tereshchenko, Konovalov? What is the hindrance, citizens the near-Socialist ministers, Chernov and Tseretelli? What is the hindrance, citizens Narodnik and Menshevik leaders of the Executive Committee of the Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies?

We did not propose, nor could anybody have proposed, anything but the immediate establishment of control over the trusts, the banks, trade, the parasites (a remarkably fine word—by way of exception—from the pen of the editors of Izvestiya!), and over foodstuffs. No one could devise anything better than “the creative effort of the entire people.”

Only we must not trust the words of the capitalists; we must not trust the naive (at best, naive) hope of the Mensheviks and the Narodniki that the capitalists can establish such control.

Ruin is threatening. A catastrophe is impending. The capitalists have brought, and are continuing to bring, all countries to their doom. There is only one way of salvation: revolutionary discipline, revolutionary measures by the revolutionary class, the proletarians and semi-proletarians, the transfer of the entire power of the state to that class, a class that is really capable of instituting control, that is really capable of successfully “combating parasitism.”

May 27 (14), 1917

INEVITABLE CATASTROPHE—UNLIMITED PROMISES ¹

I

IMMINENT economic ruin is facing us, a catastrophe of unprecedented dimensions, and we must return to the subject again and again in order that its significance may be thoroughly understood. In the last issue of Pravda we pointed out that the programme of the Executive Committee of the Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies now in no way differs from the programme of the "terrible" Bolsheviks.²

Today we must point out that the programme of the Menshevik minister Skobelev goes even beyond Bolshevism. Here is the programme, as reported in the ministerial paper, Rech:

"The Minister [Skobelev] declared that '... the state economy is on the verge of a precipice. We must interfere in every branch of the economic life of the country, for there is no money in the treasury. We must improve the conditions of the toiling masses, and to do that we must take the profits from the tills of the business men and bankers.' (Voice in the audience: 'How?') 'By ruthless taxation of property,' replied the Minister for Labour, Skobelev. 'It is a method known to the science of finance. The rate of taxation on the propertied classes must be increased to one hundred per cent of their profits.' (Voice in the audience: 'That means everything.') 'Unfortunately,' declared Skobelev, 'many corporations have already distributed their dividends among the shareholders, and we must therefore levy a progressive personal tax on the propertied classes. We will go even further, and, if the capitalists wish to preserve the bourgeois method of business, let them work without interest, so as not to lose their clients. . . . We must introduce labour service for the shareholders, bankers and factory owners, who are in a lackadaisical mood, since they have not the incentive that formerly stimulated them to work. . . . We must force the shareholders to submit to the state; they, too, must be subject to labour service.'"

We urge the workers to read and re-read this programme, to discuss it and to try to grasp the conditions necessary for its fulfilment.

¹ See note to p. 140.*—Ed.

² Cf. the previous article, "Ruin is Threatening."—Ed.

The whole point lies in the conditions necessary for its fulfilment, and in taking immediate measures for its fulfilment.

This programme in itself is an excellent one and coincides with our Bolshevik programme, except that in one particular it even goes further than our programme, namely, that it promises to "take the profits from the tills of the bankers" to the extent of "one hundred per cent."

Our Party is much more moderate. Its resolution demands much less, namely, the establishment of control over the banks and the "gradual" (just listen, the Bolsheviks are in favour of gradualness!) "transition to a more just and progressive tax on income and property."

Our Party is more moderate than Skobelev.

Skobelev hands out immoderate, nay, unlimited promises, without understanding the conditions required for their practical realisation.

That is the whole crux of the matter.

It is impossible not only to realise Skobelev's programme, but even to make any serious efforts for its realisation, either arm in arm with the ten ministers from the party of the landowners and the capitalists, or with the bureaucratic, official-ridden machine to which the government of the capitalists (plus a few Mensheviks and Narodniki) is perforce limited.

Less promises, Citizen Skobelev, and more action. Less rhetoric, and more comprehension of how to get down to business.

And we must get down to business immediately, without losing a single day, if we are to save the country from an inevitable and terrible catastrophe. But the whole point of the matter is that the "new" Provisional Government does not want to get down to business; and even if it wanted to, it could not, for it is fettered by a thousand chains which safeguard the interests of capital.

We can, and must, this very day call upon the people to get down to business; this very day a decree must be issued immediately convoking:

1) Soviets and congresses of bank employees, both of individual banks and on a national scale, with the purpose of deciding upon practical measures for merging all banking and credit establishments into a single State Bank, and for the establishment of the most careful control over all banking operations, the results of such control to be published forthwith;

2) Soviets and congresses of employees of all syndicates and trusts, with the purpose of deciding upon measures for control and accountancy; the results of such control to be published forthwith;

3) This decree should grant the right of control not only to the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers', and Peasants' Deputies, but also to Soviets of the workers of every large factory, as well as to the representatives of every large political party (parties to be regarded as large parties, which, for example, on May 25 [12] put forward independent lists of candidates in not less than two Petrograd boroughs*); all commercial books and documents to be made accessible to control;

4) The decree should call upon all shareholders, directors and members of the managing boards of all companies to publish the names of all shareholders owning stock to an amount of not less than 10,000 (or 5,000) rubles, with a list of the shares and the companies in which they are "interested"; false statements (subject to the control of the bank and other employees) shall be punished by confiscation of all property and by imprisonment for a term of not less than five years;

5) The decree should call upon the people to establish immediately, through the local organs of government, universal labour service, for the control and realisation of which there shall be established a universal people's militia (in the rural districts directly, in the cities through the workers' militia).

Without universal labour service, the country cannot be saved from ruin; and without a people's militia, universal labour service cannot be effected. This will be obvious to everyone who has not reached the stage of ministerial lunacy and who has not become crazed by excessive credulity in ministerial eloquence.

Whoever is really desirous of saving tens of millions of people from ruin must come to the defence of such measures.

In the next article we shall discuss a gradual transition to a more equitable system of taxation, and also how to advance from among the people and gradually place in ministerial positions truly gifted organisers (both from the workers and from the capitalists) who manifest ability in the performance of the kind of work above described.

II

When Skobelev, in a moment of ministerial abandon, threatened to deprive the capitalists of one hundred per cent of their profits, it was but an example of a phrase calculated for effect. Such phrases are always used to deceive the people in bourgeois parliamentary republics.

But here we have something worse than a mere phrase. "If the capitalists wish to preserve the bourgeois method of business, let them work without interest, so as not to lose their clients," Skobelev said. This sounds like a terrible threat to the capitalists; but in fact, it is an attempt (unconscious probably on the part of Skobelev, but certainly conscious on the part of the capitalists) to preserve the omnipotence of capital by a temporary sacrifice of profits.

The workers are taking "too much," reason the capitalists; let us shift the responsibility to them, without giving them either power or the opportunity to control production. Let us, the capitalists, sacrifice our profits for a time; by preserving "the bourgeois method of business," and by "not losing our clients," we shall hasten the collapse of this intermediate state of industry, we shall disorganise it in every possible way and lay the blame on the workers.

That such is the plan of the capitalists is proved by the facts. The coal-owners in the South are actually disorganising production, are "deliberately neglecting and disorganising" it (see in Novaya Zhizn, for May 29 [16] a report of statements made by a workers' delegation).^{*} The picture is clear: Rech is lying brazenly when it puts the blame on the workers. The coal-owners are "deliberately disorganising production"; and Skobelev sings his nightingale song: "If the capitalists wish to preserve the bourgeois method of business, let them work without interest." The position is clear.

It is to the advantage of the capitalists and the bureaucrats to make unlimited promises, and thus divert the attention of the people from the main thing, namely, the transfer of real control to the workers.

The workers must sweep aside high-sounding phrases, promises, declarations, projects evolved in the centre by the bureaucrats, who are always ready to draw up the most ostentatious plans, rules, regulations and standards. Down with all this lying! Down with all this hullabaloo of bureaucratic and bourgeois project-mongering that has everywhere collapsed with a crash. Down with this habit of procrastination! The workers must demand the immediate establishment of control in fact, to be exercised by the workers themselves.

That is the main thing required for the success of the cause, the cause of salvation from catastrophe. If that is lacking, everything else is sheer deception. If we have it, we need not be in a hurry to take "one hundred per cent" of the capitalists' profits. We can, and must, be more moderate; we must gradually pass to a more just system of taxation; we shall differentiate between small and large shareholders; we shall take very little from the former, and a great deal (but not necessarily all) from the latter only. The number of large shareholders is insignificant; but the role they play, like the wealth they possess, is enormous. It may safely be said that if one were to draw up a list of the five thousand or even three thousand (or perhaps even one thousand) richest men in Russia, or if one were to investigate (by means of control exercised from below, by bank, syndicate, and other employees), all the threads and ties of their finance capital, their banking connections, one would expose the whole knot of capitalist domination, the bulk of the wealth accumulated at the expense of the labour of others, and all the really important sources of "control" over social production and distribution of goods.

This control must be entrusted to the workers. It is this knot, these sources, that the interests of capital demand shall be concealed from the people. Better forego for a time "all" our profits, or ninety-nine per cent of our income, than disclose to the people these roots of our power—thus reason the capitalist class and its unconscious servant, the government official.

Under no circumstances shall we renounce our right and our demand that the main fortress of finance capital be opened to the people, that this fortress be placed under workers' control—thus the class conscious worker reasons, and will continue to reason. And every passing day will prove the correctness of this reasoning to ever greater masses of the poor, to an ever increasing majority of the people, to an ever larger number of sincere people generally, people who are honestly seeking an escape from disaster.

The main fortress of finance capital must be seized. Otherwise, all phrases, all projects for averting disaster are sheer deception. As to the individual capitalists, or even the majority of capitalists, the proletariat, far from intending to "strip" them (as Shulgin has been "scaring" himself and his friends), far from intending to deprive them of "everything," on the contrary, intends to charge them with a useful and honourable task—under the control of the workers.

When an inevitable catastrophe is impending, the most useful, the most indispensable thing for the people is organisation. Miracles of proletarian organisation—that is our slogan now, and will become still more our slogan and demand when the proletariat is in power. Without the organisation of the masses it will be absolutely impossible to establish universal labour service, which is absolutely essential, or any serious control over the banks, the syndicates and the production and distribution of goods.

That is why it is necessary to begin, and begin immediately, with a workers' militia, in order that we may proceed gradually, but firmly and intelligently, to the creation of a people's militia and the replacement of the police and the standing army by the universally armed people. That is why it is necessary to advance talented organisers from among all strata of society, from among all classes, not excepting the capitalists, who at present have more of the required experience. There are many such talented individuals among the people. Such forces lie dormant in the peasantry and the proletariat, lacking an outlet. They must be promoted from below in the course of practical work, such as in efficiently eliminating queues, in skilfully organising house committees, in organising domestic servants, in creating model farms, in putting factories taken over by the workers on a sound basis, and so on, and so forth. Having advanced such talented individuals from below in the course of practical work, and having tested their ability in practice, we must promote them all to "ministers"—not in the old sense of the term, not in the sense of rewarding them with a portfolio, but in the sense of appointing them instructors of the people, travelling organisers, assistants everywhere aiding in the work of establishing the strictest order, the greatest economy in human labour, the strictest comradely discipline.

That is what the party of the proletariat must preach to the people as the means of salvation from catastrophe. That is what it must already begin in part to carry into effect in those localities where it has gained power. That is what it must carry into effect completely when it achieves state power.

May 29-30 (16-17), 1917

SPEECH ON THE WAR

*Delivered at the First All-Russian Congress of Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, June 22, (9), 1917 **

COMRADES, allow me, by way of introduction to an examination of the war question, to recall to your minds two passages in the manifesto addressed to all the countries issued on March 27 (14) by the Petrograd Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies.

"The time has come," the manifesto reads, "to begin a resolute struggle against the predatory aspirations of the governments of all countries; the time has come for the peoples to take the question of war and peace into their own hands."

The other passage in the manifesto is addressed to the workers of the Austro-German coalition and reads:

"Refuse to serve as the instruments of depredation and violence of kings, landlords, and bankers."

These two passages are reiterated in various forms in tens, in hundreds, I think in thousands, of resolutions passed by the workers and peasants of Russia.

To my mind, these two passages, better than anything else, reveal the contradictory and hopelessly entangled situation into which the workers and peasants have fallen owing to the present policy of the Mensheviks and the Narodniki. On the one hand, they are for supporting the war; on the other, they are representatives of classes that have no interest in the predatory aspirations of the governments of all the countries, and cannot help saying so. This psychology and ideology, even if vague, is extremely deep-seated in every worker and peasant. It is a realisation of the fact that the war is being waged on behalf of the predatory aspirations of the governments of all countries. But, together with this, there is an extremely hazy understanding, or a total lack of understanding, of the fact that a government, whatever its form, is an expression of the interests of definite classes, and that, therefore, to contrast the government with the people, as is done in the first passage I have quoted, is the height of theoretical confusion and utter political helplessness, a condemnation of oneself and one's entire policy to a shaky, unstable position and conduct. The same applies to the concluding words of the second passage I have quoted. That excellent admonition "Refuse to serve as the instruments of depredation and violence of kings, landlords and bankers" is splendid; but the words "and we of our own" are omitted. For when you, Russian workers and peasants, appeal to the workers and peasants of Austria and Germany, where the governments and ruling classes are conducting the same cut-throat, predatory war as the Russian, British and French capitalists and bankers; when you say, "Refuse to serve as the instruments of your bankers," while at the same time you admit your own bankers into the cabinet and seat them side by side with Socialist ministers, you are reducing all your manifestoes to naught and are in practice negating your whole policy. In practice it is as though you never had these excellent aspirations and wishes; for you are helping Russia carry on exactly the same sort of imperialist war, exactly the same sort of predatory war. You are contradicting the very masses whom you represent, for those masses will never accept the standpoint of the capitalists, so frankly expressed by Milyukov, Maklakov and others, who say: "There is no idea more criminal than that the war is being waged in the interests of capital."

I do not know whether this idea is criminal, but I have no doubt that it is criminal in the opinion of those who only half exist today and who tomorrow perhaps will not exist at all. Yet it is the only sound idea. It alone expresses our conception of this war; it alone declares that the interests of the oppressed classes demand war on the oppressors. And when we say that the war is a capitalist war, a predatory war, and that we must not harbour illusions, we do not in the least suggest that the crimes of individual persons, of individual kings, could have brought about this war.

Imperialism is a definite stage in the development of world capital. Capitalism, after decades of growth, has reached a point where a small group of overwhelmingly rich countries—not more than four: Great Britain, France, Germany and America—have amassed vast wealth, wealth measured in hundreds of billions, have concentrated vast power in the hands of a few big bankers and big capitalists—there are half a dozen of them at most in each of these countries—have accumulated a gigantic power, which has seized the whole world, and has literally partitioned the whole globe as far as territories and colonies are concerned. The colonies of these powers are to be found side by side in all parts of the globe. They have also divided the globe among themselves economically, for there is not a piece of land anywhere in the world where concessions and the threads of finance capital have not penetrated. That is the basis of annexations. Annexations are not products of the imagination, they are not due to the fact that freedom-loving people suddenly became reactionaries. Annexations are but the political expression and the political form of the domination of the giant banks which inevitably followed from capitalism, not owing to anyone's fault, but owing to the fact that shares are the basis of banks and the accumulation of shares is the basis of imperialism. Huge banks ruling the whole world by the force of hundreds of billions of capital and uniting entire branches of industry by means of capitalist and monopolist combines—there you have the imperialism which has split the whole world into three groups of overwhelmingly wealthy plunderers.

At the head of one, the first group, the one nearest to us in Europe, stands Great Britain; at the head of the other two are Germany and America respectively, the rest, as long as capitalist relations persist, being constrained to help. Hence, if you clearly conceive this essential fact, a fact instinctively grasped by every oppressed individual, instinctively grasped by the vast majority of Russian workers and peasants—if you clearly conceive this fact, you will understand how ridiculous it is to think of fighting the war by words, manifestoes, proclamations and Socialist congresses. It is ridiculous, because, no matter how many declarations you issue, no matter how many political revolutions you effect, the banks remain omnipotent, even though you have overthrown Nicholas Romanov in Russia. Russia has made a gigantic step forward; she has perhaps at a single stride overtaken France, which, under different circumstances, accomplished the same thing in one hundred years, and nevertheless remained a capitalist country. The capitalists still remain. If they are somewhat circumscribed, so were they in 1905. But did that undermine their power? It is new to the Russians, but in Europe every revolution proved that with each rise of the revolutionary wave the workers gain a little more, but the capitalists retain power. The fight against the imperialist war can be waged only as a fight of the revolutionary classes against the ruling classes on a world-wide scale. It is not the landlords who created imperialism, although there are landlords in Russia, and although the landlords in Russia are more influential than in any other country. It is the capitalist class headed by the great financial magnates and banks. And as long as this class, which dominates over the oppressed proletarians, is not overthrown, there can be no escape from this war. The illusion that one can unite the toilers of the world by means of proclamations and appeals to other peoples is possible only from the limited Russian point of view, which knows nothing of the manner in which the press of Western Europe, where the workers and peasants are used to political revolutions and have seen them dozens of times, scoffs at such phrases and appeals. In Europe they do not know that the working class masses of Russia, who sincerely believe that the aspirations of the capitalists of the world are predatory and condemn them, and who desire the liberation of the peoples from the bankers, have actually risen. But they, the Europeans, cannot understand why you, who have organisations such as no other people in the world possess, the Soviets of Workers', Peasants', and Soldiers' Deputies, why you, who have arms, send your Socialists to be cabinet ministers. You are, after all, surrendering the power of government to the bankers. Abroad they accuse you not so much of naiveté—that would not be so bad—but of hypocrisy. The Europeans no longer understand naiveté in politics, they cannot understand that in Russia there are tens of millions of people who for the first time are awakening to life, that in Russia the connection is not understood between classes and the government, between the government and the war.

War is but a continuation of bourgeois policy, and nothing more. The ruling class determines policy also in war. War is nothing but politics, it is a continuation of the pursuit by these classes of the same ends by different means. Therefore, when in your appeal to the workers and peasants you say, "Overthrow your bankers," every class conscious European worker either laughs, or bitterly weeps, and says to himself: "What can we do, if over there they have overthrown their monarch, a half-savage idiot and monster, the kind we removed long ago—and that is the whole of our crime—and are now with the help of their 'near-Socialist' ministers supporting the Russian bankers?"

The bankers have remained in power, and are conducting their foreign policy by means of the imperialist war, supporting every one of the treaties concluded in Russia by Nicholas II. In this country it is particularly glaring. The principles of Russia's imperialist foreign policy were determined not now, but by the former government headed by Nicholas Romanov, whom we have deposed. It was he who concluded these treaties, and these treaties still remain secret. The capitalists cannot publish them, because they are capitalists. But not a single worker or peasant can understand this tangle; for he reasons that if we urge the overthrow of the capitalists in other countries, then we ought first of all to overthrow our own bankers; otherwise no one will believe us or take us seriously. They will say of us: "You Russians are naive savages, you write words which in themselves are excellent, but which have no practical meaning." Or, worse, they may think we are hypocrites. You would indeed find such arguments in the foreign press, were the press of all shades allowed to cross the Russian border, and not held up in Torneo¹ by the British and French authorities. From a mere selection of quotations from foreign newspapers you would realise into what a glaring contradiction you have fallen; you would convince yourselves how incredibly ludicrous and erroneous is the idea of fighting war by means of Socialist conferences and agreements between Socialists at congresses. Were imperialism due to the fault or the crime of individual persons, socialism would remain but a name. Imperialism is the last stage in the evolution of capitalism, in which it has already divided the whole world into bits, and in which two gigantic groups have joined in a struggle for life and death. Either serve one or the other of these groups, or overthrow both; there is no other alternative. When you oppose a separate peace on the pretext that you do not wish to serve German imperialism, you are absolutely right; that is why we too are against a separate peace.* But, as a matter of fact, despite yourselves, you go on serving Anglo-French imperialism and its aims, which are as predatory and annexatory as those which the Russian capitalists, with the help of Nicholas Romanov, embodied in the treaties. We do not know the text of these treaties, but anyone who has followed political literature, who has read a single book on economics or diplomacy, knows the content of these treaties. Ay, and Milyukov, if my memory serves me, wrote in his books of these treaties and promises that they would despoil Galicia, the Dardanelles, Armenia, preserve the old annexations and obtain a heap of new ones. That is known to everyone; yet the treaties are kept secret, and we are told that to denounce them would mean breaking with the Allies.

¹ A Finnish frontier town.—Ed. Eng. ed.

As regards a separate peace, I have already stated that there can be no separate peace for us, and the resolution of our Party leaves no shadow of doubt that we reject it, as we reject every kind of agreement with the capitalists. For us a separate peace means an agreement with the German robbers, who are plundering just as much as the others. But an agreement with Russian capital in the Russian Provisional Government is also a separate peace. The tsarist treaties are still in force, and they also plunder and stifle other peoples. When I hear the words, "peace without annexations or indemnities"—words every Russian worker and peasant should utter, because events are teaching him to utter them, because he is not interested in banking profits and because he wants to live—I reply that this slogan has utterly confused the Narodnik and Menshevik leaders of the present Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies. They have explained in Izvestiya that this implies the status quo, i.e., the pre-war situation, a return to what existed before the war. Is that not a capitalist peace? And what a capitalist peace! If you advance such a slogan, bear it in mind that the course of events may place your parties in power. That is possible in revolutionary times. You will have to fulfil your promises, and if you now propose a peace without annexations, it may be accepted by the Germans but not by the British; for the British capitalists have not lost one inch of ground; on the contrary, they have plundered all over the world. The Germans have plundered a good deal, but they have also lost a good deal, and not only have they lost a good deal, but they are faced with the intervention of America, a most formidable foe. If you, who are proposing peace without annexations, imply by that the status quo, you sink to a position where your proposal implies a separate peace with the capitalists. For if you propose the status quo, then the German capitalists, confronted with America and Italy, with whom they had once made treaties, will say: "Yes, we accept this peace without annexations; for us it is not a defeat, for us it is a victory over America and Italy." It is you who in fact are sinking to a separate peace with the capitalists, of which you accuse us; for in your policy, your deeds, your practical measures, you are not breaking in principle with the bankers, who are the representatives of imperialist domination all over the world, and whom you and your "Socialist" ministers are supporting in the Provisional Government.

Thereby you are placing yourselves in such a self-contradictory and shaky position that the masses cannot understand you. The masses, who have no interest in annexations, declare: "We do not want to fight for any capitalists." When we are told that such a policy can be stopped by congresses and agreements among the Socialists of all countries, we say: "Perhaps so, if imperialism were the work of individual criminals; but imperialism is the evolution of world capitalism, with which the working class movement is connected."

The victory of imperialism is the beginning of an inevitable, unavoidable division of the Socialists into two camps in every country. Whoever continues to regard the Socialists as a single entity, who thinks they might be a single entity, is deceiving himself and deceiving others. The whole course of the war, the whole course of the two and a half years of war, have led to this split, ever since the Basle Manifesto, which was signed unanimously, declared that war is a product of imperialist capitalism. There is not a word about "national defence" in the Basle Manifesto. No other manifesto could have been written before the war—just as at present no Socialist would propose to write a manifesto on "national defence" in case of a war between America and Japan, where neither his own skin nor his capitalists and ministers would be involved. Just try. Just write a resolution for international congresses! You know that war between Japan and America is imminent; it has been in preparation for decades, it is not fortuitous, and tactics will not depend on who fires the first shot. It is ridiculous! You know full well that American and Japanese capitalists are both equally predatory. But both sides will call for "national defence"; that will be either a crime or a terrible weakness committed in "defence" of the interests of our capitalist enemies. That is why we say that the split among the Socialists is irreparable. The Socialists have completely deserted socialism, they have gone over to the side of their governments, their bankers, their capitalists, in spite of their verbal denunciation and condemnation of the latter. Condemnation means nothing. But sometimes condemnation of the Germans for supporting their capitalists is merely a shield for the same "sin" on the part of the Russians! If you condemn the German social-chauvinists, i.e., people who are Socialists in word—perhaps many of them are Socialists at heart—but chauvinists in deed, who in deed are defending not the German people but the filthy, greedy, predatory German capitalists, then do not defend the British, French and Russian capitalists! The German social-chauvinists are no worse than those who in our government are continuing this policy of secret treaties and of plunder, and disguising that policy by innocent good wishes. Those wishes may have much good in them, and on the part of the masses I regard them as absolutely sincere, but I do not and cannot discern a single word of political truth in them. They are only your wishes; but the war remains an imperialist war, a war on behalf of the secret treaties! You call upon other peoples to overthrow their bankers, yet you support your own bankers! You spoke of peace, but you did not say what kind of peace! When we pointed to the glaring contradiction in a peace on the basis of the status quo, we received no reply. In your resolution which will speak of a peace without annexations, you will not be able to say that it is not the status quo. You will not be able to say that it is the status quo, i.e. the restoration of the pre-war situation. What, then? Deprive Great Britain of the German colonies? Just try to do it by peaceful agreement! Everybody will laugh at you. Just try, without a revolution, to take away from Japan Kiaochow and the Pacific Islands she has stolen.*

You have become entangled in inextricable contradictions. When we, however, say "without annexations," this slogan is for us but a subordinate part of the struggle against world imperialism. We say that we want to free all nations, and that we mean to begin with our own. You talk of war against annexations and of a peace without annexations; yet within Russia you continue to conduct an annexationist policy. That is monstrous! You, and your government, your new ministers, are in practice carrying on an annexationist policy in regard to Finland and the Ukraine. You are finding fault with the Ukrainian Congress, through your ministers you are prohibiting its session. What is that if not annexation? Such a policy is a mockery of the rights of a nationality that suffered tortures under the tsars because its children wanted to use their native tongue. It means that you are afraid of independent republics. From the point of view of the workers and peasants there is nothing terrible in them. Let Russia be a union of free republics. The worker and peasant masses will not fight to prevent that. Let all nationalities be liberated, first and foremost those nationalities with the help of which you are making the revolution in Russia. Unless you do this, you are condemning yourselves to be "revolutionary democracy" only in words, while in practice your whole policy spells counter-revolution.

Your foreign policy is anti-democratic and counter-revolutionary whereas a revolutionary policy might place you in a position where a revolutionary war would be indispensable. But that need not necessarily be the case. Of late this point has been much stressed by speakers and by the press. I should like to dwell on it.

What practical way out of this war do we see? We say, the only way out of this war is revolution. Support the revolution of the classes oppressed by the capitalists, overthrow the class of capitalists in your own country, and thereby set an example for other countries. That alone is socialism. That is the only way to fight the war. Everything else is promises or phrases, or innocent, pious wishes. Socialism has been rent in twain in every country of the world. But you remain entangled when you associate with those Socialists who are supporting their own governments and forget that in England and Germany the real Socialists, those who express the socialism of the masses, have been left isolated and are languishing in prison. But they alone express the interests of the proletarian movement. Suppose in Russia the oppressed class were to find itself in power? When we are asked, "How will you tear yourselves free from the war alone?" we say that to tear oneself free from the war alone is impossible. Every resolution of our Party, every speech of our orators at meetings says that it is absurd to imagine that one can tear oneself free from this war alone. Hundreds of millions of people, hundreds of billions of capital are involved in this war. There is no way out of the war except by the transfer of power to the revolutionary class, a class which is bound to destroy imperialism, i.e., the financial, banking, and annexationist ties. Unless this is done, nothing is done. The revolution reduces itself to this, that in place of tsarism and imperialism you now have a near-republic, which is imperialist through and through and which, even in the persons of the representatives of the revolutionary workers and peasants, cannot treat Finland and the Ukraine democratically, i.e., without fearing secession.

When it is said that we are striving for a separate peace, that is untrue. We say, no separate peace with any capitalists, particularly with the Russian capitalists! But the Provisional Government has made a separate peace with the Russian capitalists. Down with that separate peace! We do not recognise any separate peace with the German capitalists and will enter into no negotiations with them;¹ but neither do we want a separate peace with the British and French imperialists. We are told that a break with the latter would mean entering into an agreement with the German imperialists. That is not true; we must break with them immediately, for it is an alliance of robbery. We are told that the treaties must not be published, for that would heap disgrace upon our government and upon our whole policy in the eyes of the workers and peasants. If these treaties were published and the Russian workers and the Russian peasants were clearly told at meetings, particularly in every remote little village: "This is what you are now fighting for: for the Dardanelles, for the retention of Armenia," every one of them would reply: "We do not want such a war."

¹ See note to p. 155.*--Ed.

Chairman: Your time is up.

Voices: Please continue.

Lenin: Another ten minutes.

Voices: Please, please.

Lenin: I say that it is wrong to pose the dilemma: either with the British imperialists or with the German imperialists; peace with the German imperialists means war with the British imperialists, and vice versa. Such a dilemma suits the purpose of those who do not break with their capitalists and bankers and who are ready to consent to any form of alliance with them. But it does not suit us. We are for protecting our alliance with the oppressed classes, with the oppressed nationalities. If you remain faithful to that alliance you will be revolutionary democrats. That is not an easy task. That task does not permit one to forget that under certain circumstances a revolutionary war may be essential. No revolutionary class can forswear revolutionary war without dooming itself to a ludicrous pacifism. We are not Tolstoyans! If the revolutionary class takes power, if no annexed territories remain in its state, if banks and big capital are deprived of power—no easy thing in Russia—that revolutionary class will be waging a revolutionary war not in word but in real earnest. We cannot forswear such a war, for that would be Tolstoyism, philistinism, it would be forgetting the whole science of Marxism and the experience of all European revolutions.

Russia by herself cannot be stricken out of the war. But she has mighty allies growing, who at present have no faith in you, because your position is either self-contradictory or naive, for you advise other nations to renounce annexations, while you are introducing them in your own country. You say to other nations, "Overthrow the bankers." But you do not overthrow your own bankers. Try a different policy. Publish the treaties and expose them to the contempt of the workers and peasants. Say: "No peace with the German capitalists and a complete break with the Anglo-French capitalists! Let the British get out of Turkey, and let them not fight for Bagdad! ¹ Let them get out of India and Egypt! We do not want to fight to preserve plundered loot, nor will we expend one atom of our energy to help the German brigands preserve their loot." If you do that, and you said you would—in politics words are not believed, and with good reason—if you not only say but actually do these things, then the allies we now have will make themselves felt. Just consider the sentiments of the oppressed workers and peasants—they sympathise with you and regret that you are so weak that, having arms, you let the bankers remain. Your allies are the oppressed workers of all countries. There will come to pass what the Revolution of 1905 revealed. At the outset it was terribly weak. But what were its results internationally? How did this policy and the history of 1905 determine the foreign policy of the Russian revolution? At present you are conducting the foreign policy of the Russian revolution in complete accord with the capitalists. But 1905 has shown what the foreign policy of the Russian revolution should be. The fact is indisputable that after October 30 (17), 1905, mass disturbances broke out and barricades were erected in the streets of Vienna and Prague. Following 1905 there came 1908 in Turkey, 1909 in Persia and 1910 in China.* If you appeal to the real revolutionary democracy, the working class and the oppressed, instead of compromising with the capitalists, your allies will be not the oppressing, but the oppressed classes, not the nations where the oppressing classes are temporarily predominant, but the nations that are now being torn to pieces.

¹ Bagdad—before the war belonged to Turkey. The capital of the Irak, over which Great Britain now has the mandate.—Ed.

We have been reminded here of the German front, concerning which none of us has suggested any change, except the free distribution of our leaflets, which are printed on one side in Russian and on the other in German, and which say: "The capitalists of both countries are robbers; only their removal will be a step towards peace." But there are other fronts. We have an army on the Turkish front; its numerical strength I do not know. If this army, now kept in Armenia and perpetrating annexations which you tolerate, while preaching a peace without annexations to other peoples, although you have the strength and the authority; if that army adopted this programme, if it turned Armenia into an independent Armenian republic and gave that republic the money that is being taken from us by the French and British financiers, that would be much better! It is said that we cannot get along without the financial support of England and France. But that support supports us as the rope supports a hanged man. Let the revolutionary class of Russia say: "Down with such support, we do not recognise the debts contracted with the French and British capitalists, we call upon all to rise against the capitalists! No peace with the German capitalists, and no alliance with the British and French capitalists!" If such a policy were pursued in practice, our Turkish army would be free to turn to other fronts, for all the peoples of Asia would see that not only in word are the Russian people proclaiming a peace without annexations on the basis of national self-determination, but that the Russian workers and peasants are in actual practice assuming the lead of all the oppressed nationalities, and that the struggle against imperialism is for them not an empty wish or a glittering ministerial phrase, but a matter of vital revolutionary importance.

Our situation is such that a revolutionary war may threaten but is not inevitable, for the British imperialists will scarcely be able to wage war upon us, if you appeal to the peoples surrounding Russia with your practical example. Show that you are liberating the republic of Armenia, that you are concluding agreements with the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies of all countries, that you are for a free republic, and the foreign policy of the Russian revolution will become truly revolutionary and truly democratic. At present it is such only in word, while in fact it is counter-revolutionary; for you are bound by Anglo-French imperialism and do not wish to say so openly, are afraid to admit it. Instead of calling upon others to overthrow their bankers, it would be better were you frankly to say to the Russian people, to the workers and peasants: "We are too weak, we cannot throw off the yoke of the Anglo-French imperialists, we are their slaves, that is why we are in the war." That would be a bitter truth, and it would have revolutionary significance, it would actually bring nearer the end of this predatory war. That would mean a thousand times more than an agreement with the French and British social-chauvinists, than the convocation of congresses, than the continuation of this policy in which you are in fact afraid to break with the imperialists of one country while remaining the allies of another. You may rely on the oppressed classes of the European countries, on the oppressed peoples of weaker countries who were throttled by Russia under the tsars, and are being throttled by her now, as is the case with Armenia. If you rely on them, you may grant freedom and help their workers' and peasants' committees; you would become the leader of all oppressed classes, of all oppressed nations in their war against German and British imperialism. The latter cannot unite against you, for they themselves are engaged in a life-and-death struggle against each other, for they are themselves in a hopelessly difficult situation; whereas the foreign policy of the Russian revolution, a sincere alliance with the oppressed classes and oppressed nations, is likely to be successful; there are a hundred chances to one that it will be successful!

In the Moscow paper of our Party, we recently came across a letter from a peasant in which he expounds our programme.* I shall take the liberty of concluding my speech with a brief quotation from this letter, which shows how this peasant understood our programme. The letter appeared in No. 59 of Sotsial-Demokrat, the Moscow paper of our Party, and was reprinted in No. 68 of Pravda:

"We must press harder on the bourgeoisie until it bursts at every seam, and then the war will end. But if we do not press hard enough on the bourgeoisie, it will be bad."

THE EIGHTEENTH OF JUNE*

IN one way or another, in the annals of the Russian revolution the Eighteenth of June will be regarded as a day of crisis.

The relative position of classes, their interrelation in the struggle, their strength, particularly in comparison with the strength of the Party, were revealed so distinctly, so strikingly, so impressively by the demonstration of Sunday last, that, whatever the course and speed of further development may be, the gain in respect of conscious understanding and clarity has been tremendous.

The demonstration in a few hours scattered to the winds the vapid talk about Bolshevik conspirators, and showed incontestably that the vanguard of the toiling masses of Russia, the industrial proletariat in the capital, and the army, in their overwhelming majority support slogans that our Party has always advocated.

The measured step of the battalions of workers and soldiers. Nearly half a million demonstrators. Unity and solidarity of action, unity of slogans, among which the slogans "All power to the Soviets," "Down with the ten capitalist ministers," "Neither a separate peace with the Germans nor secret treaties with the Anglo-French capitalists," etc., were overwhelmingly predominant. No one who saw the demonstration has now any doubt that these slogans have successfully won the support of the organised vanguard of the worker and soldier masses of Russia.

The demonstration of July 1 (June 18) assumed the character of a demonstration of the strength and policy of the revolutionary proletariat, which is pointing the direction for the revolution and indicating the way out of the impasse. That is the colossal historical significance of the demonstration of last Sunday, and therein it differs essentially from the demonstration on the day of the funeral of the victims of the revolution and the demonstration of the First of May. Those demonstrations were a universal tribute to the first victory of the revolution and to its heroes; they were a retrospective glance cast by the people over the first stage of the road to freedom, which had been passed so rapidly and so successfully. The First of May was a holiday, a day of hope and good wishes, associated with the history of the international labour movement and with its ideal of peace and socialism.

Neither of the demonstrations attempted, or could attempt, to point the direction for the further movement of the revolution. Neither of the demonstrations attempted to place before the masses, or raise in the name of the masses, the concrete, definite and urgent questions of how and whither the revolution should proceed.

In this sense July 1 (June 18) was the first political demonstration of action: it was an exposition of how the various classes act, desire to act, and will act in order to further the revolution, an exposition given not in a book or a newspaper, but on the streets; not by leaders, but by the masses.

The bourgeoisie kept out of the way. In this peaceful demonstration of an admitted majority of the people, in which there was freedom of party slogans, and the chief aim of which was to protest against counter-revolution, the bourgeoisie refused to participate. That is natural. The bourgeoisie is the counter-revolution. It hides from the people; it organises regular counter-revolutionary conspiracies against the people. The parties now ruling Russia, the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik parties, patently revealed themselves on the historic day of July 1 (June 18) as parties of indecision. Their slogans spoke of hesitation, and the supporters of their slogans were clearly and obviously in a minority. By their slogans and vacillations they advised the people to remain where they were, to leave everything unchanged for the time being. And the people felt, as they themselves felt, that that was impossible.

Enough of vacillation—the vanguard of the proletariat, the vanguard of the worker and soldier masses of Russia declared. Enough of vacillation. The policy of faith in the capitalists, in their government, in their reformist exertions, in their war, in their policy of an offensive—that policy is hopeless. Its collapse is imminent. Its collapse is inevitable. And that collapse will also be the collapse of the ruling parties, the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks. Economic ruin is imminent. There is no escaping it, except by revolutionary measures of the revolutionary class after it has assumed power.

The people must renounce the policy of trusting the capitalists; they must place their confidence in the revolutionary class—the proletariat, which is the only source of power. It alone is the pledge that the interests of the majority will be served, the interests of the toilers and the exploited, who have been crushed by war and capital, but who are capable of triumphing over war and capital.

A crisis of unprecedented dimensions is descending upon Russia and upon the whole of humanity. The only escape is to place confidence in the most organised and advanced section of the toilers and exploited and to support its policy.

Whether the people will grasp this lesson soon, and how they will put it into effect, we do not know. But we know for certain that apart from this lesson there is no escape from the impasse, that possible vacillations and brutalities on the part of the counter-revolutionaries will lead nowhere.

There is no way out unless the masses of the people place complete faith in their leader, the proletariat.

July 3 (June 20), 1917

ON SLOGANS*

Too often has it happened when history has taken a sharp turn that even the most advanced of parties have been unable for a long time to adapt themselves to the new situation; they continued to repeat the slogans that were formerly true, but which now had no meaning, having lost that meaning as "suddenly" as the turn in history was "sudden."

Something of the sort may, apparently, repeat itself in connection with the slogan regarding the transfer of the entire power of the state to the Soviets. That slogan was correct during a period of our revolution—say from March 12 (February 27) to July 17 (4)—that has now passed irrevocably. That slogan has patently ceased to be true now. Unless this is understood, it is impossible to understand anything of the urgent questions of the present time. Every particular slogan must be derived from the entire complex of specific peculiarities of the given political situation. And the political situation in Russia now, after July 17 (4), differs radically from the situation of March 12 (February 27) to July 17 (4).

During that, now past, period of our revolution what is known as a dual power prevailed in the state, which both materially and formally expressed the indefinite and transitory nature of the state power. Let us not forget that the question of power is the fundamental question of every revolution.

At that time the state power was in a condition of instability. It was shared, by voluntary consent, by the Provisional Government and the Soviets. The Soviets were composed of delegations from the mass of free (i.e., not subject to external coercion) and armed workers and soldiers. The essence of the situation was that the arms were in the hands of the people, and that no coercion was exercised over the people from without. That is what opened up and ensured a peaceful path for the development of the revolution. The slogan, "All power to the Soviets," was a slogan for the next immediate step, which could be directly effected in this peaceful path of development. It was a slogan for a peaceful development of the revolution, which was possible between March 12 (February 27) and July 17 (4), and which was, of course, most desirable, but which now is absolutely impossible.

Apparently, not all the supporters of the slogan, "All power to the Soviets," have given sufficient thought to the circumstance that it was a slogan for a peaceful development of the revolution. It was peaceful not only in the sense that nobody, no class, no single force of any importance, was able then—between March 12 (February 27) and July 17 (4)—to resist or prevent the transfer of power to the Soviets. That is not all. Peaceful development would then have been possible even in the sense that the struggle of classes and parties within the Soviets could have assumed a most peaceful and painless form, provided the state power in its entirety had passed to the Soviets in good time.

This aspect of the case has also not yet received sufficient attention. The Soviets in their class composition were organs of the movement of the workers and peasants, the ready-made form of their dictatorship. Had they possessed the entire state power, the main shortcoming of the petty-bourgeois strata, their chief sin, namely, confidence in the capitalists, would have been overcome in practice, would have been subjected to the criticism of the experience of their own measures. The substitution of classes and parties in power could have proceeded peacefully within the Soviets, based upon the sole and undivided power of the latter. The contact of all the Soviet parties with the masses could have remained stable and unimpaired. One must not for a single moment forget that only such a close contact between the Soviet parties and the masses, freely growing in extent and depth, could have helped the petty bourgeoisie peacefully to outlive their deluded faith in compromises with the bourgeoisie. The transfer of power to the Soviets would not, and could not, of itself have changed the interrelation of classes; it would not in any way have changed the petty-bourgeois nature of the peasantry. But it would have made a big and timely step towards severing the peasants from the bourgeoisie, towards bringing them closer to, and then uniting them with, the workers.

This is what might have been had power passed in good time to the Soviets. That would have been the most easy, the most advantageous course for the people. Such a course would have been the least painful, and it was therefore necessary to fight for it most energetically. Now, however, this struggle, the struggle for the timely transfer of power to the Soviets, has ended. A peaceful course of development has been rendered impossible. The non-peaceful and most painful course has begun.

The critical change of July 17 (4) consists precisely in the fact that the objective situation took an abrupt turn. The unstable situation in regard to the state power has come to an end; the power at the decisive point has passed into the hands of the counter-revolution. The development of the parties on the basis of a compromise between the petty-bourgeois Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks and the counter-revolutionary Cadets has brought about a situation in which both these petty-bourgeois parties have in practice become the aiders and abettors of counter-revolutionary butchery. The unenlightened confidence of the petty bourgeoisie in the capitalists has led the former, in the course of the development of the struggle of parties, to deliberately and consciously support the counter-revolutionaries. The cycle of development of party relations is complete. On March 12 (February 27) all classes were united against the monarchy. After July 17 (4), the counter-revolutionary bourgeoisie, working hand in glove with the monarchists and the Black Hundreds, secured the support of the petty-bourgeois Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks, partly by intimidating them, and handed over the actual state power to the Cavaignacs,* the military ruffians, who are shooting insubordinate soldiers at the front and dealing ruthlessly with the Bolsheviks in Petrograd.

The slogan of transferring the state power to the Soviets would now sound quixotic, or a sheer mockery. This slogan would be a virtual fraud on the people; it would be inspiring them with the delusion that it is enough even now for the Soviets merely to wish to take power, or to proclaim it, in order to secure power, that there are still parties in the Soviet which have not been tainted by aiding the butchers, and that it is possible to undo the past.

It would be a profound error to think that the revolutionary proletariat is capable of "refusing" to support the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks against the counter-revolution in "revenge," so to speak, for the support they gave in smashing the Bolsheviks, in shooting down soldiers at the front and in disarming the workers. First, this would be ascribing philistine conceptions of morality to the proletariat (since, for the good of the cause, the proletariat will always support not only the vacillating petty bourgeoisie but even the big bourgeoisie); and secondly—and that is the main thing—it would be a philistine attempt to substitute "moralising" for the true political issue.

And the true political issue consists in the fact that power can now no longer be taken peacefully. It can be obtained only by victory in a decisive struggle against the real holders of power at the present moment, namely, the military ruffians, the Cavaignacs, who are relying on the reactionary troops brought to Petrograd and on the Cadets and the monarchists.

The true political issue consists in the fact that these new holders of state power can be defeated only by the revolutionary masses of the people, whose movement depends not only on their being led by the proletariat, but also on their turning their backs upon the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik parties, which have betrayed the cause of the revolution.

Those who bring philistine morals into politics reason as follows: Let us assume that it is true that the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks committed an "error" in supporting the Cavaignacs, who are disarming the proletariat and the revolutionary regiments; still, we must give them a chance to "rectify" their "error"; we must not make it difficult for them to rectify their "error"; we must make it easier for the petty bourgeoisie to incline towards the side of the workers. Such reasoning is childishly naive or simply stupid, or else a new fraud on the workers. For if the petty-bourgeois masses inclined towards the workers it would mean, and could only mean, that these masses had turned their backs upon the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks. The Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik parties could rectify their "error" now only by denouncing Tseretelli, Chernov, Dan and Rakitnikov as aiders and abettors of the butchers. We are fully and unconditionally in favour of their error being "rectified" in that way. . . .

We said that the fundamental question of revolution is the question of power. We must add that revolutions at every step illustrate how the question of where the actual power lies is beclouded, and reveal the divergence between formal power and real power. That is one of the chief characteristics of every revolutionary period. In March and April 1917, it was not clear whether the real power was in the hands of the government or in the hands of the Soviets.

Now, however, it is particularly essential that the class conscious workers should soberly face the fundamental question of the revolution, namely: Who holds the state power at the present moment? Consider its material manifestations, do not accept words for deeds, and you will have no difficulty in finding the answer.

The state consists, first of all, of detachments of armed men with material appurtenances, such as jails, wrote Frederick Engels.* Now it consists of the military cadets and the reactionary Cossacks, who have been specially brought to Petrograd; it consists of those who keep Kamenev and others in jail; who have shut down the newspaper Pravda; who have disarmed the workers and a definite section of the soldiers; who are shooting down an equally definite section of the soldiers; who are shooting down an equally definite section of troops in the army. These butchers are the real power. Tseretelli and Chernov are ministers without power, puppet ministers, leaders of parties that support the butchers. That is a fact. And the fact is not altered even though Tseretelli or Chernov personally, no doubt, "do not approve" of the butchery, and even though their papers timidly dissociate themselves from it. Such changes of political garb change nothing in substance.

The organ of 150,000 Petrograd workers ¹ has been suppressed; the military cadets on July 19 (6) killed the worker Voinov for carrying Listok Pravdy from the printshop. Is this not butchery? Is this not the work of Cavaignacs? But in this neither the government nor the Soviets are "guilty," we shall be told.

¹ I.e., Pravda, the central organ of the Bolsheviks.—Ed.

So much the worse for the government and the Soviets, we reply; for that means that they are ciphers, puppets, and that the real power is not in their hands.

First of all, and above all, the people must know the truth—they must know in whose hands the state power really lies. The people must be told the whole truth, namely, that the power is in the hands of a military clique of Cavaignacs (Kerensky, certain generals, officers, etc.) who are supported by the bourgeoisie as a class, headed by the Constitutional-Democratic Party and by all the monarchists, acting through the Black Hundred papers, Novoye Vremya, Zhivoye Slovo, etc., etc.

That power must be overthrown. Unless that is done all talk of fighting counter-revolution is but empty phrases, "self-deception and deception of the people."

That power now has the support both of the ministers, Tsere-telli and Chernov, and of their parties. We must explain to the people the butcher's role they are playing and the fact that such a finale for these parties was inevitable after their "errors" of May 4 (April 21), May 18 (5), June 22 (9) and July 17 (4)* and after their approval of the policy of an offensive at the front, a policy which predetermined nine-tenths of the victory of the Cavaignacs in July.

Agitational work among the people must be reshaped to deal with the concrete experience of the present revolution, and particularly of the July days, i.e., it must clearly point to the real enemy of the people, the military clique, the Constitutional-Democrats and the Black Hundreds, and must definitely unmask the petty-bourgeois parties, the Socialist-Revolutionary and the Menshevik parties, which played and are playing the part of butcher's assistants.

Agitational work among the people must be reshaped in order to make it clear that it is absolutely hopeless to expect that the peasants will obtain land as long as the power of the military clique has not been overthrown, as long as the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik parties have not been exposed and made to forfeit the people's confidence. That would be a very long and arduous process under "normal" conditions of capitalist development. But the war and economic ruin will tremendously accelerate the process. These are "accelerators" that may make a month or even a week equal to a year.

Two objections may probably be made to what has been said above: first, that to speak now of a decisive struggle is to encourage sporadic action, which would only be to the advantage of the counter-revolution; secondly, that the overthrow of the latter would still mean the transfer of power to the Soviets.

To the first argument we reply: The workers of Russia are already class conscious enough not to yield to provocation at a moment which is clearly unfavourable to them. Nobody can deny that to take action and to offer resistance at the present moment would be abetting counter-revolution. Neither can it be denied that a decisive struggle will be possible only in the event of a new revolutionary upsurge among the very depths of the masses. But it is not enough to speak in general of a revolutionary upsurge, of the rising tide of revolution, of aid by the West European workers, and so forth; we must draw a definite conclusion from our past, from the lessons we have learnt. And that will lead us precisely to the slogan of a decisive struggle against the counter-revolution, which has usurped power.

The second argument also reduces itself to a substitution for concrete truths of arguments of too general a character. No one, no force, except the revolutionary proletariat, can overthrow the bourgeois counter-revolution. Now, after the experience of July 1917, it is the revolutionary proletariat that must take over state power independently. Without that the victory of the revolution is impossible. Power in the hands of the proletariat supported by the poor peasantry or semi-proletarians—that is the only solution. And we have already indicated the factors that can enormously accelerate this solution.

Soviets may, indeed are bound to, appear in this new revolution, but not the present Soviets, not organs of compromise with the bourgeoisie, but organs of a revolutionary struggle against the bourgeoisie. It is true that we shall even then be in favour of building the whole state on the Soviet model. It is not a question of Soviets in general; it is a question of combating the present counter-revolution, of combating the treachery of the present Soviets.

The substitution of the abstract for the concrete is one of the greatest and most dangerous sins in a revolution. The present Soviets have failed, they have suffered utter collapse because they were dominated by the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik parties. At this moment the Soviets resemble sheep brought to the slaughter, bleating pitifully under the knife. The Soviets at present are impotent and helpless against triumphant and triumphing counter-revolution. The slogan of transferring power to the Soviets might be construed as a "simple" appeal for the transfer of power to the present Soviets, and to say that, to appeal for that now, would be to deceive the people. Nothing is more dangerous than deceit.

The cycle of development of the class and party struggle in Russia from March 12 (February 27) to July 17 (4) is complete. A new cycle is beginning, one that involves not the old classes, not the old parties, not the old Soviets, but classes, parties and Soviets that have been rejuvenated in the fire of struggle, tempered, schooled and re-created in the process of struggle. We must look forward, not backward. We must operate not with the old, but with the new, post-July, class and party categories. We must, at the beginning of the new cycle, proceed from the triumphant bourgeois counter-revolution, which triumphed because the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks compromised with it, and which can be vanquished only by the revolutionary proletariat. Of course, in this new cycle there will be many and various stages including the final victory of the counter-revolution, the final defeat (without a struggle) of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks and a new upsurge of a new revolution. But of this it will be possible to speak only later, as each of these stages makes its appearance. . . .

July 1917

CONSTITUTIONAL ILLUSIONS ¹

CONSTITUTIONAL illusions is the term for a political error which consists in the fact that people believe in the existence of a normal, juridical, regulated, and legalised, in brief, "constitutional," system, which in fact does not exist at all. It would seem at first glance that in present-day Russia, in this month of July 1917, when a constitution has not even been drafted, such constitutional illusions are impossible. But that is a profound mistake. In fact, the essential characteristic of the present political situation in Russia is that extremely large numbers of the population are under the sway of constitutional illusions. Unless this is understood, it is impossible to understand anything of the present political situation in Russia. Not even an approach to a correct conception of the tactical tasks in present-day Russia is possible unless prime attention is devoted to a systematic and merciless exposure of constitutional illusions, to laying bare their roots, and to re-establishing a proper political perspective.

Let us take three opinions characteristic of the constitutional illusions of the present day and examine them carefully.

The first of these opinions is that our country is on the eve of the convocation of a Constituent Assembly, and that, therefore, everything that is now going on is of a temporary, transitory, non-essential, non-decisive character, and that everything will soon be revised and definitely regulated by the Constituent Assembly. The second opinion is that certain parties—e.g., the Socialist-Revolutionaries or the Mensheviks, or an alliance of both—possess an obvious and undisputed majority among the people, or in "highly influential" institutions, such as the Soviets, and that therefore the will of these parties and of these institutions, as the will of the majority of the people in general, cannot be ignored, and still less violated, in republican, democratic and revolutionary Russia. The third opinion is that a certain measure, for instance, the suppression of Pravda, was not legally sanctioned either by the Provisional Government or by the Soviets, and that, therefore, it is but an episode, a chance occurrence, which must in no case be regarded as possessing decisive significance.

¹ See note to p. 167.*—Ed.

Let us examine each of these opinions.

I

The convocation of a Constituent Assembly was promised by the first Provisional Government. That government considered that its main task was to lead the country to a Constituent Assembly. The second Provisional Government appointed October 13 (September 30) as the day for the convocation of the Constituent Assembly. The third Provisional Government, after the events of July 17 (4), solemnly confirmed this date.

Nevertheless, the chances are ninety-nine out of a hundred that the Constituent Assembly will not be convened on that date. If it does meet on that date, the chances are again ninety-nine out of a hundred that it will be as impotent and useless as was the First Duma,* so long as a second revolution does not succeed in Russia. To become convinced of this, one has only to abstract oneself for a minute from the hubbub of phrases, promises and petty doings of the day, which clog the brain, and cast a glance at that which is fundamental, that which determines everything in public life—the class struggle.

It is clear that the bourgeoisie in Russia has become closely amalgamated with the landlords. This is shown by the press, the elections, the policy of the Cadet Party and of the parties still further to the Right, and by the utterances made at the various “congresses” of “interested” persons.

The bourgeoisie understands perfectly well what the petty-bourgeois Socialist-Revolutionary and “Left” Menshevik chatter-boxes cannot understand, namely, that it is impossible to abolish private property in land in Russia, and without compensation at that, except by a gigantic economic revolution, by placing the banks under the control of the entire people, by nationalising the trusts and by adopting a series of the most ruthless revolutionary measures against capital. The bourgeoisie understands that perfectly well. But at the same time it cannot help knowing, seeing and feeling that the vast majority of the peasants in Russia will now not only express themselves in favour of confiscating the landed estates, but will even prove to be much more Left than Chernov. For the bourgeoisie knows better than we do how many partial concessions have been made by Chernov, let us say, from May 19 (6) to June 15 (2), in the matter of delaying and narrowing down the various demands of the peasants, and how much effort was expended by the Right Socialist-Revolutionaries (Chernov, you know, is regarded as the "Centre" by the Socialist-Revolutionaries) at the Peasant Congress and on the Executive Committee of the All-Russian Soviet of Peasants' Deputies in order to "soothe" the peasants and to feed them with promises.

The bourgeoisie differs from the petty bourgeoisie in that it has learned from its economic and political experience the conditions under which "order" (i.e., the enslavement of the masses) can be preserved under the capitalist system. The bourgeois are businessmen, conversant with large-scale commercial transactions, and are accustomed to approach even political questions in a strictly business-like manner; they have no confidence in words and know how to take the bull by the horns.

The Constituent Assembly in Russia today will yield a majority to peasants who are more Left than the Socialist-Revolutionaries. The bourgeoisie knows this, and, knowing it, it naturally resists in the most energetic manner an early convocation of the Constituent Assembly. With the existence of a Constituent Assembly it will be impossible, or extremely difficult, to wage the imperialist war in the spirit of the secret treaties concluded by Nicholas II, or to defend the landed estates or the payment of compensation for them. The war will not wait. The class struggle will not wait. This was obviously shown even in the brief span from March 13 (February 28) to May 4 (April 21).

From the very beginning of the revolution there have been two views regarding the Constituent Assembly. The Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks, completely swayed by constitutional illusions, viewed the matter with the naive confidence of the petty bourgeois who refuses to know anything about the class struggle: The Constituent Assembly has been proclaimed, the Constituent Assembly will be—and that's all there is to it! All else is of the devil. The Bolsheviks, on the contrary, said: Only the growing strength and authority of the Soviets can guarantee the convocation of the Constituent Assembly and its success. The Mensheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionaries laid emphasis on the legal act: the proclamation, the promise, the declaration of the convocation of the Constituent Assembly. The Bolsheviks laid emphasis on the class struggle: if the Soviets win, the Constituent Assembly is assured; if not, it is not assured.

And that is exactly what happened. The bourgeoisie have been waging, at times covertly and at times overtly, an incessant and relentless struggle against the convocation of the Constituent Assembly. This struggle was expressed in a desire to delay its convocation until the end of the war. It was expressed in repeated postponements of the date of convocation of the Constituent Assembly. When at last, after July 1 (June 18), more than a month after the formation of the Coalition Cabinet, the date for the convocation of the Constituent Assembly was appointed, a Moscow bourgeois paper declared that this was done under the pressure of Bolshevik agitation. Pravda has published an exact quotation from this paper.*

After July 17 (4), when the servility and the timidity of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks led to the "victory" of the counter-revolution, a brief but highly significant phrase slipped into Rech respecting the "speediest possible" convocation of the Constituent Assembly! But on July 29 (16), an item appeared in Volya Naroda and in Russkaya Volya to the effect that the Cadets were demanding the postponement of the convocation of the Constituent Assembly under the pretext that it was "impossible" to summon it at such "short" notice, and that, the item states, the Menshevik Tseretelli, doing lackey service to the counter-revolution, had given his consent to its postponement until December 3 (November 20)!

Undoubtedly, this item slipped in despite the wish of the bourgeoisie. Such "revelations" are not to their advantage. But murder will out. The counter-revolution, becoming brazen after July 17 (4), blurted out the truth. The first seizure of power by the counter-revolutionary bourgeoisie after July 17 (4) is immediately accompanied by a measure (a very serious measure) directed against the convocation of the Constituent Assembly.

That is a fact. And that fact reveals the utter futility of constitutional illusions. Unless a new revolution takes place in Russia, unless the power of the counter-revolutionary bourgeoisie (and particularly of the Cadets) is overthrown, unless the people withdraw their confidence from the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik parties, parties of compromise with the bourgeoisie, the Constituent Assembly will either never be convoked, or else will be a "Frankfort talkshop,"* an impotent and useless assembly of petty bourgeois, frightened to death by the war and by the prospect of a "boycott of the government" by the bourgeoisie, and helplessly torn between convulsive efforts to rule without the bourgeoisie and the fear of having to get along without the bourgeoisie.

The question of the Constituent Assembly is subordinate to the question of the course and issue of the class struggle between the bourgeoisie and the proletariat. Some time ago, we recall, Rabochaya Gazeta blurted out the remark that the Constituent Assembly would be a Convention. This is an example of the empty, wretched and contemptible bragging of our Menshevik lackeys of the counter-revolutionary bourgeoisie. In order not to be a "Frankfort talkshop" or a First Duma, in order to be a Convention, one must have the courage, the capacity and the strength to aim ruthless blows at the counter-revolution, and not compromise with it. For this purpose the power must be in the hands of the most advanced, most resolute and most revolutionary class of the present epoch. For this purpose that class must be supported by the whole mass of the urban and rural poor (the semi-proletarians). This requires that the counter-revolutionary bourgeoisie particularly, i.e., particularly the Cadets and the higher command of the army shall be dealt with mercilessly. Such are the real, the class, the material conditions necessary for a Convention. It is enough to enumerate these conditions precisely and clearly in order to realise how ridiculous is the bragging of Rabochaya Gazeta and how incredibly foolish are the constitutional illusions of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks regarding a Constituent Assembly in present-day Russia.

II

Marx, when he castigated the petty-bourgeois "Social-Democrats" of 1848, was particularly severe in his condemnation of their unbridled use of phrases regarding "the people" and the majority of the people in general.* It is well to recall this when examining the second opinion, when analysing the constitutional illusions on the subject of a "majority."

Certain definite and concrete conditions are required to make it really possible for the majority in the state to decide. It requires, first, the establishment of a state system, of a form of state power, which would permit the possibility of deciding matters by a majority, and which would guarantee this possibility actually being realised. Secondly, it requires that this majority, by its class composition, by the interrelation of classes inside (and outside) this majority, should be able to draw the chariot of state harmoniously and effectively. Every Marxist knows that these two concrete conditions are of decisive importance in the question of a majority of the people and of the direction of state affairs in accordance with the will of the majority. Nevertheless, the political literature of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks, and still more their political conduct, betrays a complete lack of understanding of these conditions.

If the political power in the state is in the hands of a class the interests of which coincide with the interests of the majority, the administration of that state in accordance with the will of the majority will be possible.

If, however, the political power is in the hands of a class the interests of which differ from the interests of the majority, any form of majority rule is bound to lead to the duping or suppression of the majority. Every bourgeois republic provides hundreds and thousands of examples of this kind. In Russia the bourgeoisie rules both economically and politically. Its interests, particularly during the imperialist war, are in violent conflict with the interests of the majority. Hence, from a materialist and Marxist, and not from a formal and juridical standpoint, the whole point is to expose this conflict, and to endeavour to prevent the masses from being duped by the bourgeoisie.

Our Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks, on the contrary, have fully shown and proved that their true role is to be an instrument of the bourgeoisie for deceiving the masses (the "majority"), to be the medium and the abettors of that deception. No matter how sincere individual Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks may be, their fundamental political ideas—that it is possible to escape from the imperialist war and to achieve a "peace without annexations and indemnities" without a dictatorship of the proletariat and the triumph of socialism, and that it is possible to secure the transfer of the land to the people without compensation and to establish "control" over production in the interests of the people without the same condition—these fundamental political (and, of course, economic) ideas of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks are in practice nothing but petty-bourgeois self-deception, or, which is the same thing, deception practised by the bourgeoisie on the masses (the "majority").

That is our first and main "amendment" to the question of the majority as understood by the petty-bourgeois democrats, Socialists of the Louis Blanc type, the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks. What, in practice, is the value of a "majority," if a majority is in itself but a formal factor, while materially, in actual reality, that majority is a majority of the parties with the help of which the bourgeoisie deceives the majority?

And, of course—and this leads us to our second "amendment," to the second of the above-mentioned fundamental conditions—this deception can be correctly understood only by ascertaining its class roots and its class meaning. This is not personal deception, not (to put it bluntly) a "swindle," but rather an illusory idea arising out of the economic situation in which a class finds itself. The petty bourgeois is in such an economic situation, the conditions of his life are such, that he cannot help deceiving himself, he involuntarily and inevitably gravitates now towards the bourgeoisie, now towards the proletariat. It is economically impossible for him to pursue an independent "line."

His past draws him towards the bourgeoisie, his future towards the proletariat. His judgment gravitates towards the latter, his prejudice (to use an expression of Marx's)* towards the former. In order that the majority of the people may become an actual majority in the administration of the state, and thereby the actual servant of the interests of the majority, the actual protector of its rights, and so forth, a definite class condition is required, viz., that the majority of the petty bourgeoisie, at least at the decisive moment and in the decisive place, shall join forces with the revolutionary proletariat.

Without this, a majority is but a fiction which may prevail for some little time, may glitter and shine, make a noise, gather laurels, but which is absolutely and inevitably doomed to failure. Such, be it noted in passing, was the failure of the majority of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks, as revealed in the Russian revolution in July 1917.

Furthermore, a revolution differs from the "normal situation" in a state precisely by the fact that controversial questions of state life are decided by the direct struggle of classes and the struggle of masses, even to the point of armed struggle. It cannot be otherwise when the masses are free and armed. It follows from this fundamental fact that in times of revolution it is not sufficient to ascertain the "will of the majority"; nay, one must prove to be the stronger at the decisive moment and in the decisive place; one must be victorious. Beginning with the Peasant War in the Middle Ages in Germany, and throughout all the big revolutionary movements and epochs, including 1848 and 1871, and including 1905, we see innumerable examples of how the better organised, more class conscious, and better armed minority forces its will upon the majority and vanquishes it.

Frederick Engels particularly emphasised the lesson to be drawn from the experience which to some degree is common to the Peasant Revolt of the sixteenth century and to the Revolution of 1848 in Germany, namely, disunity of action and lack of centralisation on the part of the oppressed masses owing to their petty-bourgeois status in life.* And examining the matter from this angle too we arrive at the same conclusion, namely, that a simple majority of the petty-bourgeois masses decides nothing, and can decide nothing, for the disunited millions of rural petty proprietors can acquire organisation, political consciousness in action and centralisation of action (which is essential for victory) only when they are led either by the bourgeoisie or by the proletariat.

It is well known that in the long run the problems of social life are decided by the class struggle in its bitterest and acutest form, the form of civil war. And in this war, as in any other war—a fact also well known and in principle not disputed by anyone—it is economics that decide. It is highly characteristic and significant that the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks, while not denying this “in principle” and while perfectly realising the capitalist character of present-day Russia, dare not soberly look the truth in the face. They are afraid to admit the truth that every capitalist country, including Russia, is fundamentally divided into three main forces: the bourgeoisie, the petty bourgeoisie, and the proletariat. The first and third are spoken of by all and recognised by all. As to the second—which is indeed the numerical majority!—nobody cares soberly to admit its significance, economic, political, or military.

The truth is no flatterer. That is why the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks shrink from knowing their own selves.

III

When we started writing this article, the suppression of Pravda was but an “incident” and had not yet been ratified by the government. But now, after July 29 (16), the government has formally suppressed Pravda.

If one regards it historically, as a whole and in conjunction with the entire process of preparation for this measure and its realisation, this suppression casts a remarkably clear light on the "nature of the constitution" in Russia and on the danger of constitutional illusions.

It is a known fact that the Cadet Party, headed by Milyukov and the paper Rech, have ever since April been demanding repressive measures against the Bolsheviks. This demand for repression, voiced in various forms, from "statesman-like" articles in Rech to Milyukov's repeated cries, "Arrest them" (Lenin and other Bolsheviks), has been one of the major components, if not the major component, of the political programme of the Cadets in the revolution.

Long before Alexinsky and Co., in June and July, invented and fabricated the vile and calumnious charge that the Bolsheviks were German spies and in receipt of German money; long before the equally calumnious charge—contradicted by generally known facts and published documents—of "armed insurrection" and "mutiny," long before all this, the Cadet Party had been systematically, steadily and relentlessly demanding repressive measures against the Bolsheviks. Since this demand has now been realised, what opinion must one have of the honesty or the intelligence of people who forget, or make believe they forget, the true class and party origin of this demand? How are we to characterise the attempt on the part of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks to pretend that they believe that the "occasion" furnished on July 17 (4) for the repressive measures against the Bolsheviks was an "incidental," an "isolated" case—how are we to characterise it, if not as a crude falsification or the most incredible political imbecility? There must after all be a limit to the distortion of indisputable historical truths!

It is sufficient to compare the movement of May 3-4 (April 20-21) with that of July 16-17 (3-4) to realise their similarity of character: they were marked by the same objective features: a spontaneous outburst of discontent, impatience and indignation on the part of the masses; provocative shots from the Right; killings on the Nevsky; calumnious outcries on the part of the bourgeoisie, and particularly the Cadets, to the effect that "It was the Leninists who fired the shots on the Nevsky"; the extreme bitterness and aggravation of the struggle between the proletarian masses and the bourgeoisie; an utter loss of presence of mind on the part of the petty-bourgeois parties, the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks, and a tremendous range of vacillation in their policy and in their approach to the question of state power generally. And June 22-23 (9-10) and July 1 (June 18) present an identical class picture in another form.

The course of events is as clear as can be: the growing dissatisfaction, impatience and indignation of the masses; the increasing aggravation of the struggle between the proletariat and the bourgeoisie, particularly for influence over the petty-bourgeois masses, and, in this connection, two very important historical events, which prepare the way for the dependence of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks on the counter-revolutionary Cadets. These events are, first, the formation on May 19 (6) of a coalition cabinet, in which the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks proved to be servitors of the bourgeoisie, by becoming increasingly entangled by deals and agreements with the latter, by showing it thousands of "complaisances" in delaying the most essential revolutionary measures; second, the offensive at the front. The offensive inevitably implied the renewal of the imperialist war, a vast increase in the influence, weight and authority of the imperialist bourgeoisie, a widespread dissemination of chauvinism among the masses, and, last but not least, a transfer of power, at first the military power and then the state power generally, to the counter-revolutionary higher command of the army.

Such is the course of the historical events which between May 3-4 (April 20-21) and July 16-17 (3-4) rendered class antagonisms deeper and keener, and which after July 17 (4) enabled the counter-revolutionary bourgeoisie to accomplish that which already on May 3-4 (April 20-21) had become clearly outlined as its programme and tactics, its immediate aim and the "clean" means which were to lead to the achievement of that aim.

Nothing from a historical point of view can be more puerile, more pitiful theoretically and ridiculous practically, than the philistine whining (indulged in also, it should be said, by L. Martov) over July 17 (4) and the assertion that the Bolsheviks somehow managed to inflict defeat upon themselves, that it was caused by their own "adventurism," and so on, and so forth. All this whining, all this moralising to the effect that one should not have participated (in an attempt to lend a "peaceful and organised" character to the entirely justified dissatisfaction and indignation of the masses!), is either sheer apostasy, when proceeding from Bolsheviks, or the usual expression of the usual state of fright and confusion of the petty bourgeois. As a matter of fact, the movement of July 16-17 (3-4) grew out of the movement of May 3-4 (April 20-21) as inevitably as summer follows spring. It was the unconditional duty of the proletarian party to remain with the masses and endeavour to lend as peaceful and organised a character as possible to their justified action, and not to stand aside and wash their hands like Pontius Pilate on the pedantic plea that the masses were not organised to the last man and that in their movement excesses are sometimes committed—as though no excesses had been committed on May 3-4 (April 20-21), as though there has ever in history been a serious movement of the masses in which excesses were not committed!

And the defeat of the Bolsheviks after July 17 (4) followed with historical inevitability from the whole preceding course of events; for on May 3-4 (April 20-21) the petty-bourgeois masses and their leaders, the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks, were not yet tied by the offensive on the war front and had not yet become entangled by their petty deals with the bourgeoisie in the "Coalition Cabinet," whereas by July 17 (4) they had become so tied and entangled that they could not but signify their readiness to co-operate (in repressions, calumnies and butcher's work) with the counter-revolutionary Cadets. On July 17 (4) the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks finally sank into the cesspool of counter-revolution, because they had been sliding towards it throughout May and June by their participation in the Coalition Cabinet and their approval of the policy of an offensive on the war front.

We may appear to have deviated from our subject, namely, the suppression of Pravda, in order to give a historical estimate of the events of July 17 (4). But it only appears so, for in reality the one cannot be understood without the other. We have seen that, if one discerns the essence of the matter and the connection between events, the closing down of Pravda, the arrests and other forms of persecution of the Bolsheviks are but the realisation of the old programme of the counter-revolution and of the Cadets in particular.

It would now be highly instructive to examine who precisely it was that carried this programme into effect, and by what methods.

Let us consider the facts. On July 15-16 (2-3) the movement was growing; the masses were seething with indignation owing to the inactivity of the government, the high cost of living, economic disruption, and the offensive at the front. The Cadets withdrew, playing at resigning and presenting an ultimatum to the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks, and leaving them, who were tied to power but had no power, to pay for the defeat and the indignation of the masses.

On July 15-16 (2-3) the Bolsheviks were trying to restrain the masses from action. This has been acknowledged even by an eyewitness from Dyelo Naroda, who recounted what took place in the Grenadier Regiment on July 15 (2). On the evening of July 16 (3), the movement broke its banks and the Bolsheviks drew up an appeal explaining that the movement must maintain a "peaceful and organised" character. On July 17 (4), provocative shots from the Right increased the number of victims of the firing on both sides. It must be pointed out that the promise of the Executive Committee to investigate the incidents, to issue bulletins twice a day, etc., etc., has remained an empty promise! The Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks did nothing whatever, did not even publish a complete list of the dead on both sides!

On the night of July 17 (4) the Bolsheviks drew up an appeal, which was printed in Pravda that same night, calling for the cessation of the demonstration. But that same night there began, first, a movement of counter-revolutionary troops into Petrograd (apparently upon the summons or with the consent of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks, of their Soviets—a "delicate" point, regarding which, of course, strict silence is maintained even now, when every atom of necessity for secrecy has disappeared!). Secondly, that very same night raids on the Bolsheviks were begun by military cadets and similar elements acting upon the instructions of the Commander of the Forces, Polovtsev, and of the general staff. On the night of July 17 (4), the Pravda office was raided. On July 18-19 (5-6), the printing plant of Trud was wrecked; a workingman by the name of Voinov was killed in broad daylight for carrying Listok Pravdy from the printing office; house searches and arrests were undertaken among the Bolsheviks and the revolutionary regiments were disarmed.

Who started all this? Not the government and not the Soviet, but the counter-revolutionary military gang centred around the general staff and acting in the name of the "intelligence service" and circulating the fabrication of Pereverzev and Alexinsky in order to "arouse the ire" of the army, and so forth.

The government is absent; the Soviets are absent; they are trembling for their own fate: they receive message after message to the effect that the Cossacks may come and smash them. The Black Hundred and Cadet press, which led the hounding of the Bolsheviks, is beginning to hound the Soviets. The Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks have fettered themselves hand and foot by their own policy. It was as fettered people that they called (or tolerated the calling of) counter-revolutionary troops to Petrograd. And that fettered them still more. They have sunk to the bottom of the hideous counter-revolutionary cesspool. They have cravenly dismissed their own commission, appointed to investigate the "case" of the Bolsheviks. They basely surrendered the Bolsheviks to the counter-revolutionaries. They abjectly participated in the demonstration on the occasion of the funeral of the Cossacks, and thus kissed the hand of the counter-revolutionaries.

They are fettered; they are at the bottom of the pit.

They toss uneasily; they present the government to Kerensky, then they go to Canossa to the Cadets, then they organise a "Zemsky Sobor"¹ or a "coronation" of the counter-revolutionary government in Moscow.* Kerensky dismisses Polovtsev.

¹ National assembly.—Ed. Eng. ed.

But nothing comes of all this uneasy tossing; the essence of the situation remains unchanged. Kerensky dismisses Polovtsev, but at the same time gives shape and legality to Polovtsev's measures and to his policy: he suppresses Pravda, he introduces capital punishment for the soldiers, he forbids the holding of meetings at the front, he continues to arrest Bolsheviks (even Kollontai!) in accordance with Alexinsky's programme.

The "essence of the constitution" in Russia is being revealed with striking clarity: the offensive at the front and the coalition with the Cadets in the rear have cast the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks into the cesspool of counter-revolution. In reality, the state power is passing into the hands of the counter-revolution, into the hands of the military gang. Kerensky and the government of Tseretelli and Chernov are but a screen for it; they are compelled to create post factum a legal foundation for its measures, actions and policies.

The haggling that is going on between the Cadets and Kerensky, Tseretelli and Chernov is of secondary significance, if not entirely insignificant. Whether in this haggling the Cadets win, or whether Tseretelli and Chernov hold out "alone," will in no wise affect the essence of the situation. The Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks have swung over to counter-revolution (forced by the policy they have been pursuing since May 19 [6])—and that is the fundamental, the main and decisive fact.

The cycle of party development is complete. The Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks sank steadily from their "confidence" in Kerensky on March 13 (February 28) to May 19 (6), which bound them to the counter-revolution, and then to July 18 (5), when they reached the very depths of counter-revolution.

A new phase is beginning. The victory of counter-revolution is causing disillusionment on the part of the masses with the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik parties, and is opening the way for the adoption by the masses of a policy of supporting the revolutionary proletariat.

LESSONS OF THE REVOLUTION *

EVERY revolution involves a severe crisis in the lives of vast masses of the people. Unless the time is ripe for such a crisis, no real revolution can take place. And just as a crisis in the life of an individual teaches him a great deal and is fraught with mental suffering and emotional stress, so also a revolution teaches a whole people many a rich and valuable lesson in a very short space of time.

During a revolution millions and tens of millions of people learn in a week more than they do in a year of their ordinary somnolent life. For during a severe crisis in the life of a people it becomes particularly apparent what aims the various classes of the people are pursuing, what forces they control, and what methods they resort to in action.

It behoves every class conscious worker, every soldier and every peasant carefully to ponder the lessons of the Russian revolution, particularly now, at the end of July, when it has become obvious that the first stage of our revolution has ended in failure.

What indeed were the working class and peasant masses striving for when they made the revolution? What did they expect of the revolution? They expected, as we know, freedom, peace, bread and land.

But what do we see now?

Instead of freedom, the old despotic rule is beginning to be re-established. Capital punishment is being introduced for the soldiers at the front. Peasants are being prosecuted for arbitrary seizure of the landed estates. The printing plants of workers' newspapers are being smashed. Workers' newspapers are being suppressed without trial. Bolsheviks are being arrested, often without charges being preferred or upon charges obviously based on calumny.

It may be argued that the prosecution of the Bolsheviks does not constitute a violation of freedom, for only definite individuals are being prosecuted and on definite charges. But such an argument would be a deliberate and obvious untruth; for what justification can there be for wrecking printing presses and suppressing newspapers on account of the crimes of individual persons, even if these charges are proved and established by court of law? It would be a different thing if the government had legally declared the whole Party of the Bolsheviks, their whole policy and views, to be criminal. But everybody knows that the government of a free Russia could not, and did not, do anything of the kind.

The main thing is that the newspapers of the landlords and capitalists furiously abused the Bolsheviks for their opposition to the war and for their hostility to the landlords and the capitalists, and demanded the open arrest and prosecution of the Bolsheviks, even at a time when not a single charge had been trumped up against a single Bolshevik. The people want peace. But the revolutionary government of free Russia has again started a war of conquest on the basis of the secret treaties which the former Tsar Nicholas II concluded with the British and French capitalists in order that the Russian capitalists might plunder other nations. These secret treaties have remained unpublished to this very day. The government of free Russia has resorted to subterfuges and refrained from proposing a just peace to all the nations.

There is no bread. Famine is again looming. Everybody can see that the capitalists and the rich are shamelessly cheating the treasury in the matter of military supplies (the war is now costing the people fifty million rubles daily), that they are raking in untold profits as a result of high prices, while nothing whatever is being done to establish a rigid control by the workers over the production and distribution of goods. The capitalists are becoming more brazen every day, throwing workers on to the streets at a time when the people are suffering from lack of commodities. A vast majority of the peasants at congress after congress have loudly and clearly proclaimed the ownership of land by the landlords to be an injustice and a robbery. But a government which calls itself revolutionary and democratic has been leading the peasants by the nose for months and deceiving them by promises and delays. For months Minister Chernov was not allowed by the capitalists to issue laws prohibiting the sale and purchase of land. And when finally this law was passed, the capitalists started an infamous campaign of vilification against Chernov and are continuing this campaign to the present day.

The government has become so brazen in its defence of the landlords that it is beginning to bring peasants to trial for "arbitrary" seizure of land.

They are leading the peasants by the nose by persuading them to wait for the Constituent Assembly. But the convocation of the Assembly is being all the time postponed by the capitalists. Now that, owing to the pressure of the Bolsheviks, the date of its convocation has been set for October 13 (September 30), the capitalists are openly clamouring that this is "impossibly" short notice, and are demanding the postponement of the Constituent Assembly. . . . The most influential members of the party of capitalists and landlords, the "Cadet," or the "People's Freedom," Party, such as Panina, are openly advocating that the convocation of the Constituent Assembly be postponed until the end of the war.

As to the land, wait until the Constituent Assembly. As to the Constituent Assembly, wait until the end of the war. As to the end of the war, wait until we have won a complete victory. That is what it comes to. The capitalists and landlords, having a majority in the government, are simply mocking the peasants.

* * *

But how could this have happened, in a free country, after the overthrow of the tsarist power?

In a country that is not free, the people are ruled by a tsar and a handful of landlords, capitalists and bureaucrats, who are not elected by anybody.

In a free country, the people are ruled only by those who have been elected for that purpose by the people themselves. At the elections people are divided into parties, and as a rule each class of the population forms its own party; for instance, the landlords, the capitalists, the peasants and the workers each form their own party. Hence, the people are ruled in free countries by means of an open struggle of parties and by free agreement arrived at by these parties among themselves.

For a period of about four months following the overthrow of the tsarist power on March 12 (February 27), 1917, Russia was ruled as a free country, i.e., by means of an open struggle of freely formed parties and by free agreement among these parties. Hence, in order to understand the development of the Russian revolution, it is above all necessary to study what were the chief parties, what class interests they defended, and what were the chief interrelations between these parties.

* * *

After the overthrow of the tsarist government the state power passed into the hands of the first Provisional Government. It consisted of representatives of the bourgeoisie, i.e., the capitalists, joined by the landlords. The party of the "Cadets," the chief party of the capitalists, occupied the foremost place as the ruling and government party of the bourgeoisie.

It was not by chance that this party secured power, although it was not the capitalists, of course, but the workers and peasants, the soldiers and sailors, who fought the tsarist troops and shed their blood for freedom. Power was secured by the party of the capitalists, because that class possessed the advantage of wealth, organisation, and knowledge. Since 1905, and particularly during the war, the class of capitalists and landlords associated with them in Russia made its greatest progress in the matter of its own organisation.

The Cadet Party had always been monarchist; it was so both in 1905 and from 1905 to 1917. After the victory of the people over the tsarist tyranny that party declared itself a republican party. The experience of history shows that when the people triumph over the monarchy capitalist parties always consent to become republican, in order the better to defend the privileges of the capitalists and their power over the people.

In word, the Cadet Party stands for "the freedom of the people." But in deed it stands for the capitalists, and it was immediately joined by the landlords, the monarchists, and the Black Hundreds. The press and the elections are proof of this. All the bourgeois papers and the whole Black Hundred press began to sing in unison with the Cadets after the revolution. Not daring to come out openly, all the monarchist parties supported the Cadet Party at the elections, as, for instance, in Petrograd.

Having obtained state power, the Cadets bent every effort to continue the predatory war of conquest begun by Tsar Nicholas II, who had concluded secret predatory treaties with the British and French capitalists. By these treaties the Russian capitalists were promised, in the event of victory, the seizure of Constantinople, Galicia, Armenia, etc. As to the people, the government of the Cadets put them off with idle subterfuges and promises, deferring all matters of vital and essential interest to the workers and peasants until the Constituent Assembly, the date of the convocation of which, however, it did not appoint.

The people, making use of their freedom, began to organise independently. The chief organisation of the workers and peasants, who form the overwhelming majority of the population of Russia, was the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers', and Peasants' Deputies. These Soviets began to be formed as early as the February Revolution, and within a few weeks all class conscious and advanced members of the working class and the peasantry were united in Soviets in most of the large cities of Russia and in many rural districts.

The elections to the Soviets were carried on in complete freedom. The Soviets were genuine organisations of the masses of the people, the workers and peasants. The Soviets were genuine organisations of the vast majority of the people. The workers and the peasants, clad in military uniform, were armed.

It goes without saying that the Soviets could, and should, have taken the entire power of the state into their hands. Pending the convocation of the Constituent Assembly there should have been no other power in the state than the Soviets. Only thus could our revolution have become a true people's revolution, a true democratic revolution. Only thus could the toiling masses, who are genuinely anxious for peace, and who have no interest in a war of conquest, have begun to carry out a decided and firm policy, which would have put an end to the war of conquest and would have led to peace. Only thus could the workers and peasants have bridled the capitalists, who are making vast profits "in the war" and have reduced the country to a state of ruin and starvation. But in the Soviets only a minority of the deputies were on the side of the party of the revolutionary workers, the Bolshevik Social-Democrats, who demanded that the whole state power should be transferred to the Soviets. The majority of the deputies in the Soviets were on the side of the parties of the Menshevik Social-Democrats and the Socialist-Revolutionaries, who were opposed to the transfer of power to the Soviets. Instead of removing the government of the bourgeoisie and replacing it by a government of the Soviets, these parties insisted on supporting the government of the bourgeoisie, arriving at an agreement with it, and forming a common government with it. This policy of compromise with the bourgeoisie pursued by the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik parties, who enjoyed the confidence of the majority of the people, forms the main feature of the development of the revolution during the five months since its outbreak.

Let us first see how the compromise of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks with the bourgeoisie took place, and then let us seek an explanation of the fact that the majority of the people trusted them.

The Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries compromised with the capitalists in one form or another at every period of the Russian revolution.

At the beginning of March (the end of February) 1917, as soon as the people had triumphed and the tsarist power had been overthrown, the capitalist Provisional Government accepted Kerensky as one of its members as a "Socialist." As a matter of fact, Kerensky had never been a Socialist; he had only been a Trudovik, and had joined the "Socialist-Revolutionaries" only in March 1917, when to do so had become both safe and profitable. Through Kerensky, who was vice-chairman of the Petrograd Soviet, the capitalist Provisional Government immediately set about binding and taming the Soviet. The Soviet, i.e., the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks who predominated in it, allowed itself to be tamed and agreed immediately after the formation of the capitalist Provisional Government to "support it" "to the extent that" it carried out its promises.

The Soviet regarded itself as a body for supervising and controlling the actions of the Provisional Government. The leaders of the Soviet established what was known as a Contact Commission for maintaining relations with the government. Within this Contact Commission the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik leaders of the Soviet conducted continuous negotiations with the capitalist government; they were in fact ministers without portfolios, unofficial ministers.

This state of affairs continued during the whole of March and almost the whole of April. The capitalists resorted to delays and subterfuges, endeavouring to gain time. Not a single step of any importance was taken by the capitalist government during this period in the direction of developing the revolution. It did absolutely nothing even in furtherance of its direct task, the convocation of the Constituent Assembly; it did not submit the question to the localities or even set up a Central Commission to handle the preparations. The government was concerned with only one thing, namely, with surreptitiously renewing the predatory international treaties concluded by the tsar with the capitalists of Great Britain and France, cautiously and unostentatiously thwarting the revolution and promising everything without fulfilling anything. The Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks in the Contact Commission acted like fools and were fed on grandiloquent phrases, promises and hopes. Like the crow in the fable, the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks succumbed to flattery and listened with great satisfaction to the assurances of the capitalists that they valued the Soviets highly and would not take a single step without them.

But time passed and the capitalist government did absolutely nothing for the revolution. On the contrary, it managed during this period, in detriment to the revolution, to renew the secret predatory treaties, or rather to confirm them and "vitalise" them by supplementary and no less secret negotiations with the diplomats of British and French imperialism. It managed during this period, in detriment to the revolution, to lay the foundations of a counter-revolutionary organisation of (or at least of closer relations among) the generals and officers of the army on active service. In detriment to the revolution, it managed to start an organisation of industrialists, manufacturers and millowners, who, under the onslaught of the workers, were compelled to make concession after concession, but who at the same time began to sabotage production and to prepare at a favourable moment to bring it to a standstill.

However, the organisation of the advanced workers and peasants in the Soviets was steadily progressing. The best representatives of the oppressed classes felt that, notwithstanding the agreement between the government and the Petrograd Soviet, notwithstanding the oratory of Kerensky, notwithstanding the Contact Commission, the government was an enemy of the people, an enemy of the revolution. The masses felt that unless the resistance of the capitalists were broken, the cause of peace, the cause of freedom, the cause of the revolution would inevitably be lost. The impatience and bitterness of the masses grew.

The climax came on May 3-4 (April 20-21). The movement flared up spontaneously; nobody prepared it. The movement was so definitely directed against the government that one regiment rose in arms and appeared at the Mariinsky Palace to arrest the ministers. It became obvious to everybody that the government could not remain in power. The Soviets could (and should) have taken power without meeting the least resistance from any quarter. Instead, the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks supported the collapsing capitalist government, entangled themselves in still further compromises and adopted measures that were still more fatal to the revolution.

The revolution is enlightening all classes with a rapidity and thoroughness unknown in normal, peaceful times. The capitalists, better organised, more experienced in the affairs of the class struggle and politics, learned its lessons faster than the others. Perceiving that the position of the government was untenable, they resorted to a measure which for many decades now, ever since 1848, has been practised by the capitalists of other countries in order to fool, divide and weaken the workers. This measure is what is known as a "coalition" government, i.e., a joint cabinet of members of the bourgeoisie and of renegades from socialism.

In countries where freedom and democracy have longest existed side by side with a revolutionary labour movement, namely, in Great Britain and France, the capitalists have frequently and successfully resorted to this method. When they enter a bourgeois cabinet the "Socialist" leaders inevitably prove to be pawns, puppets, screens for the capitalists, instruments for deceiving the workers. The "democratic and republican" capitalists of Russia resorted to this same method. The Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks let themselves be fooled at once, and the "Coalition" Cabinet, with the participation of Chernov, Tseretelli and Co., became a fact on May 19 (6).

The fools of the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik parties were jubilant and bathed self-admiringly in the rays of the ministerial glory of their leaders. The capitalists gleefully rubbed their hands at having found coadjutors against the people in the shape of the "leaders of the Soviets" and at having secured the promise of the latter to support "offensive actions at the front," i.e., a renewal of the imperialist predatory war which for a while had come to a standstill. The capitalists were well aware of the puffed-up impotence of these leaders, they knew that the promises of the bourgeoisie—regarding control over, or even the organisation of, production, regarding a policy of peace, and so forth—would never be fulfilled.

And that is exactly what happened. The second phase in the development of the revolution, May 19 (6) to June 22 (9) or July 1 (June 18), fully corroborated the expectations of the capitalists as to the ease with which the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks could be duped.

While Plekhanov and Skobelev were fooling themselves and the people with grandiloquent speeches to the effect that one hundred per cent of the profits of the capitalists would be taken away from them, that their "resistance was broken," and so forth, the capitalists were steadily fortifying themselves. Nothing, absolutely nothing, was undertaken during the whole of this period to curb the capitalists. The minister renegades from socialism were mere talking machines for distracting the attention of the oppressed classes, while the entire apparatus of state administration remained in the hands of the bureaucracy (the government officials) and the bourgeoisie. The notorious Palchinsky, Vice-Minister for Industry, was a typical representative of that apparatus, thwarting every measure aimed at the capitalists. The ministers talked and talked, but everything remained as of old.

The bourgeoisie used Minister Tseretelli particularly to fight the revolution. He was sent to "calm" Kronstadt * when the local revolutionaries had the audacity to remove an appointed commissar. The bourgeoisie launched in its newspapers an incredibly vociferous, violent and vicious campaign of lies, calumnies and slander against Kronstadt, accusing it of desiring "defection from Russia," repeating this and similar absurdities in a thousand different modifications in order to terrify the petty bourgeoisie and the philistines. A most typical representative of the stupid and frightened philistines, Tseretelli, was more "conscientious" than the rest in swallowing the bait of bourgeois calumny; he was more zealous than the rest in "fulminating against and subduing" Kronstadt, without realising that he was playing the role of lackey of the counter-revolutionary bourgeoisie. The result was that he was the instrument of the "compromise" arrived at with revolutionary Kronstadt, in accordance with which the commissar for Kronstadt is not simply appointed by the government, but is elected locally, and confirmed by the government. It was on such miserable compromises that the ministers who had fled from socialism to the bourgeoisie wasted their time.

Wherever it was impossible for a bourgeois minister to appear before the revolutionary workers or the Soviets in defence of the government, a "Socialist" minister—Skobelev, or Tseretelli, or Chernov—appeared (or, more correctly, was sent by the bourgeoisie) and faithfully performed the work of the bourgeoisie; he would do his level best to defend the cabinet, whitewash the capitalists and fool the people by repeating the old, old promises, and by counselling them to wait, wait, wait.

Minister Chernov particularly was engaged in bargaining with his bourgeois colleagues; down to July, down to the new "government crisis" which began after the movement of July 16-17 (3-4), down to the time when the Cadets withdrew from the cabinet, Minister Chernov was continuously engaged in the useful and interesting work, so beneficial to the people, of persuading his bourgeois colleagues, counselling them to agree at least to the prohibition of the sale and purchase of land. Such a prohibition had been most solemnly promised to the peasants at the All-Russian (Soviet) Congress of Peasants' Deputies in Petrograd. But the promise remained but a promise. Chernov proved unable to fulfil it either in May or in June, until the revolutionary tide, the spontaneous outbreak of July 16-17 (3-4), which coincided with the retirement of the Cadets from the cabinet, made it possible to enact this measure. But even so it was an isolated measure, incapable of causing any palpable improvement in the struggle of the peasantry against the landlords for the land.

Meanwhile, at the front the counter-revolutionary imperialist task of renewing the imperialist predatory war, a task which Guchkov, so hated by the people, had been unable to fulfil, was being fulfilled successfully and brilliantly by the "revolutionary democrat" Kerensky, that newly-baked member of the Socialist-Revolutionary Party. He was intoxicated with his own eloquence, incense was burned to him by the imperialists, who were using him as a pawn; he was flattered; he was worshipped. All this because he served the capitalists religiously, persuading the "revolutionary army" to agree to renew the war which was being fought in fulfilment of the treaties concluded by Tsar Nicholas II with the capitalists of Great Britain and France, a war fought in order that the Russian capitalists might secure Constantinople, Lemberg, Erzerum and Trebizond.

Thus passed the second phase of the Russian revolution—May 19 (6) to June 22 (9). The counter-revolutionary bourgeoisie strengthened and consolidated itself, and, shielded and defended by the "Socialist" ministers, prepared to launch an offensive both against the external enemy and against the internal enemy, i.e., the revolutionary workers.

On June 22 (9), the party of the revolutionary workers, the Bolsheviks, were preparing for a demonstration in Petrograd with the purpose of giving organised expression to the steadily growing dissatisfaction and indignation of the masses. The Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik leaders, entangled in compromises with the bourgeoisie and bound by the imperialist policy of an offensive at the front, were horrified, feeling that they were losing their influence among the masses. A general howl was raised against the demonstration, in which the counter-revolutionary Cadets united with the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks. Under their leadership, and as a result of their policy of compromise with the capitalists, the swing-over of the petty-bourgeois masses to an alliance with the counter-revolutionary bourgeoisie became definite and obvious. Therein lies the historical significance and class meaning of the crisis of June 22 (9).

The Bolsheviks called off the demonstration, not desiring to lead the workers into desperate collision with the united Cadets, Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks. But the latter, in order to retain at least a remnant of the confidence of the masses, were compelled to call a general demonstration for July 1 (June 18). The bourgeoisie were beside themselves with rage, rightly discerning in this a certain vacillation of the petty-bourgeois democrats towards the proletariat; they decided to paralyse the action of the democracy by an advance at the front.

And indeed, July 1 (June 18) marked an imposing victory for the slogans of the revolutionary proletariat, the slogans of Bolshevism, among the Petrograd masses. And on July 2 (June 19) the bourgeoisie and the Bonapartist¹ Kerensky solemnly announced that the offensive at the front had begun on the very day of July 1 (June 18).

¹ Bonapartism (from the name of the two French emperors, Bonaparte)—an epithet applied to a government which, endeavouring to appear non-partisan when the struggle between the parties of the capitalists and the workers has grown particularly acute, actually utilises the situation for its own advantage. In reality serving the capitalists, such a government most of all dupes the workers by promises and petty doles.

The offensive at the front meant in fact a resumption of the predatory war in the interests of the capitalists against the will of the vast majority of the toilers. That is why the offensive at the front was inevitably accompanied, on the one hand by a gigantic growth of chauvinism and the transfer of the military power (and consequently of the state power) to the clique of military Bonapartists, and on the other by the adoption of repressive measures against the masses, the persecution of the internationalists, the abolition of the freedom of agitation and the arrest and shooting of those opposed to the war.

May 19 (6) bound the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks to the triumphal chariot of the bourgeoisie with a rope: July 1 (June 18) shackled them, as servants of the capitalists, with a chain.

With the renewal of the predatory war, the bitterness of the masses naturally gained rapidly in intensity. July 16-17 (3-4) witnessed an outburst of indignation, which the Bolsheviks attempted to restrain, but which they were, of course, bound to endeavour to lend the most organised form possible.

The Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks, slaves of the bourgeoisie and enchained by their master, agreed to everything: they agreed to the drafting of reactionary troops into Petrograd, to the restoration of capital punishment, to disarming the workers and the revolutionary troops, to arrests, prosecutions and the suppression of newspapers without trial. The power which the bourgeoisie in the government were unable to secure entirely, and which the Soviets did not wish to secure, fell into the hands of the military clique, the Bonapartists, who of course were wholly supported by the Cadets and the Black Hundreds, by the landlords and capitalists.

And so from step to step. Having set foot on the inclined plane of compromise with the bourgeoisie, the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks slid headlong to the bottom. On March 13 (February 28), in the Petrograd Soviet, they promised conditional support to the bourgeois government. On May 19 (6) they saved it from collapse and allowed themselves to be made its servants and defenders by agreeing to an offensive at the front. On June 22 (9) they united with the counter-revolutionary bourgeoisie in a campaign of furious rage, lies and calumnies against the revolutionary proletariat. On July 2 (June 19) they approved the resumption of the predatory war, which had already begun. On July 16 (3) they consented to the summoning of reactionary troops, and this was the beginning of their final surrender of power to the Bonapartists. Down and down, from step to step.

This shameful finale of the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik parties is not fortuitous: it is a consequence of the economic situation of the small masters, the petty bourgeoisie, as has been repeatedly borne out by the experience of Europe.

Everybody, of course, has observed how the small master bends every effort and strains every nerve to get on in the world, to become a real master, to rise to the position of an "established" employer, a real bourgeois. As long as capitalism rules, there is no other alternative for the small master except himself to become a capitalist (and that is possible at best for one in every hundred small masters), or to become a ruined man, a semi-proletarian, and ultimately a proletarian. The same is true in politics: the petty-bourgeois democrats, especially their leaders, tend to follow the bourgeoisie. The leaders of the petty-bourgeois democracy console their masses with promises and assurances as to the possibility of reaching agreement with the big capitalists; at best, they obtain from the capitalists for a very short time certain small concessions for a small upper stratum of the toiling masses; but in every decisive question, in every important matter, the petty-bourgeois democracy are always to be found in the wake of the bourgeoisie, as a feeble appendage of the bourgeoisie, an obedient tool in the hands of the financial kings. The experience of Great Britain and France has proved this over and over again.

The experience of the Russian revolution from February to July 1917, when events developed with unusual rapidity, particularly under the influence of the imperialist war and the profound crisis arising therefrom—that experience has most strikingly and palpably confirmed the old Marxist truth concerning the instability of the position of the petty bourgeoisie.

The lesson of the Russian revolution is that there is no escape for the masses from the iron grip of war, famine and enslavement to the landlords and capitalists, unless they completely break with the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik parties, unless they clearly recognise the treacherous role of the latter, unless they renounce all compromise with the bourgeoisie and decidedly come over to the side of the revolutionary workers. Only the revolutionary workers, supported by the poor peasants, can smash the resistance of the capitalists and lead the people to the conquest of the land without compensation, to complete freedom, to salvation from famine, the cessation of the war, and to a just and lasting peace.

September 12-13 (August 30-31), 1917

POSTSCRIPT

This article, as is apparent from the text, was written at the beginning of August (the end of July).

The history of the revolution during the month of August has fully corroborated what was said in this article. Then, at the end of August, the Kornilov revolt ¹ created a new turn in the revolution, by clearly showing the people that the Cadets, in alliance with the counter-revolutionary generals, are striving to disperse the Soviets and to restore the monarchy. How strong this new turn of the revolution is, and whether it will succeed in putting an end to the ruinous policy of compromise with the bourgeoisie, the near future will show.

September 19 (6), 1917

¹ See note to p. 205.*—Ed.

TO THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF THE RUSSIAN SOCIAL- DEMOCRATIC LABOUR PARTY *

It is possible that these lines will arrive too late, for events are developing with an at times dizzying rapidity. I am writing this on Wednesday, September 12 (August 30), and the recipients will read it not earlier than Friday, September 15 (2). Nevertheless, I take the chance and consider it my duty to write the following.

The Kornilov revolt was extremely unexpected (unexpected at such a time and in such a form); it was, one might say, an incredibly abrupt turn in the course of events.

Like every abrupt turn in events, it calls for a revision and alteration of tactics. And, as in the case of every revision, one must be super-cautious in order not to lose sight of principles.

It is my conviction that those who are drifting (like Volodarsky) into defencism or (like other Bolsheviks) into a bloc with the Socialist-Revolutionaries and into supporting the Provisional Government are guilty of lack of principle. It is absolutely wrong and unprincipled. We shall become defencists only after the power has passed to the proletariat, after peace has been proposed and after the secret treaties and ties with the banks have been broken; only after all this. Neither the fall of Riga nor the fall of Petrograd will make us defencists (I particularly beg that this be given to Volodarsky to read). Until then, we are for a proletarian revolution, we are opposed to the war, we are not defencists.

And even now we must not support Kerensky's government. That would be unprincipled. It will be asked: What, not even fight Kornilov? Of course, fight him! But that is not the same thing; there is a dividing line; that line is being overstepped by certain Bolsheviks, who allow themselves to become "compromisers" and to be carried away by the flood of events.

We will fight and are fighting Kornilov, just as Kerensky's troops are. But we do not support Kerensky; on the contrary, we expose his weakness. That is the difference. It is a rather subtle difference, but an extremely important one, and must not be forgotten.

What change, then, is necessitated in our tactics by the Kornilov revolt?

We must change the form of our struggle against Kerensky. While not relaxing our hostility towards him one iota, while not withdrawing a single word we uttered against him, while not renouncing the aim of overthrowing Kerensky, we say: We must reckon with the present state of affairs; we shall not overthrow Kerensky just now; we shall adopt a different method of fighting him, namely, we shall point out to the people (who are fighting Kornilov) the weakness and vacillation of Kerensky. That was done before too. But now it has become the main thing. That is the change.

The change, furthermore, consists in this, that the main thing now is to intensify our agitation in favour of what might be called "partial demands" to be addressed to Kerensky, namely: arrest Milyukov; arm the Petrograd workers; summon the Kronstadt, Viborg and Helsingfors troops to Petrograd; disperse the State Duma; * arrest Rodzyanko; legalise the transfer of the landlords' estates to the peasants; introduce workers' control over bread and over the factories, etc., etc. These demands must be addressed not only to Kerensky, and not so much to Kerensky as to the workers, soldiers and peasants who have been carried away by the struggle against Kornilov. Draw them still further; encourage them to beat up the generals and officers who are in favour of supporting Kornilov; urge them to demand the immediate transfer of the land to the peasants; suggest to them the necessity of arresting Rodzyanko and Milyukov, of dispersing the State Duma, of shutting down Rech and the other bourgeois papers, and of instituting proceedings against them. The "Left" Socialist-Revolutionaries particularly must be pushed in this direction.

It would be wrong to think that we have departed from the task of the conquest of power by the proletariat. Not at all. We have approached much nearer to it; only not directly but oblique-

ly. And at this very minute we must conduct our agitation against Kerensky not so much directly as indirectly, that is, by demanding a most active energetic and truly revolutionary war against Kornilov. The development of that war alone may put us in power, but of this we must speak as little as possible in our agitation (all the time remembering that events may any day put the power into our hands, and then we shall not relinquish it). It seems to me that this should be transmitted in the form of a letter to agitators (not through the press), to our agitators and propagandists, and to the members of the Party generally. As to the talk of defence of the country, of a united front of revolutionary democracy, of supporting the Provisional Government, and so forth, we must oppose it ruthlessly as being mere talk. This is the time for action. We must tell them: You, Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik gentlemen, have long ago worn these phrases to shreds. This is the time for action; the war against Kornilov must be conducted as a revolutionary war; the masses must be drawn into it, they must be aroused, inflamed (Kerensky is afraid of the masses, he is afraid of the people). In the war against the Germans action is now required; an immediate and unequivocal peace must be proposed on precisely formulated terms. If we do that, we may secure either a speedy peace or the transformation of the war into a revolutionary war. Otherwise all the Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries will remain lackeys of imperialism.

* * *

P.S. I have seen six issues of Rabochy since this was written, and I must say that there is complete harmony in our views. I greet with all my heart the splendid editorials, the press reviews and the articles by V. M—n and Vol—y. As to Volodarsky's speech, I have read his letter to the editors, and it also "liquidates" the reproaches I brought against him.* Once more, hearty greetings and best wishes.

September 12 (August 30), 1917

COMPROMISES *

THE term compromise in politics implies the surrender of certain of one's demands, the renunciation of part of one's demands by agreement with another party.

The usual idea of the man in the street regarding the Bolsheviks, an idea fostered by the systematic calumniations of the press, is that the Bolsheviks are opposed to all compromises, no matter with whom and under what circumstances.

That idea is flattering to us as the party of the revolutionary proletariat, for it shows that even our enemies are obliged to admit our loyalty to the fundamental principles of socialism and the revolution. Nevertheless, the truth must be told: this idea does not correspond to the facts. Engels was right when, in his criticism of the manifesto of the Blanquist Communists (1873), he ridiculed their declaration, "No compromise!"  That is a mere phrase, he said, for compromises are often unavoidably forced upon a fighting party by circumstances, and it is absurd once and for all to refuse "to stop at intermediate stations." The task of a truly revolutionary party is not to renounce compromises once and for all, but to be able throughout all compromises, when they are unavoidable, to remain true to its principles, to its class, to its revolutionary purpose, to its task of preparing the way for the revolution and of educating the masses for victory in the revolution.

For instance, participation in the Third and Fourth Dumas  was a compromise, a temporary renunciation of revolutionary demands. But that was an absolutely unavoidable compromise, for the existing relation of forces made it impossible for us for the time being to conduct a mass revolutionary struggle, and in order to be able to make prolonged preparations for it one had to be able to work even from within such a "pigsty." That the attitude of the Bolsheviks as a party towards this question was absolutely correct has been proved by history.

At the present moment the question is one not of an enforced, but of a voluntary compromise.

Our Party, like every other political party, is striving to secure political domination for itself. Our aim is the dictatorship of the revolutionary proletariat. Six months of revolution have proved vividly, forcibly and convincingly that this demand is correct and inevitable in the interests of this revolution, for otherwise the people will never obtain a democratic peace, or land for the peasantry, or complete freedom (i.e., a fully democratic republic). This has been manifested and proved by the course of events during the half-year of our revolution, by the struggle of the classes and parties and by the development of the crises of May 3-4 (April 20-21), June 22-23 (9-10), July 1-2 (June 18-19), July 16-18 (3-5) and September 9-13 (August 27-31).*

The Russian revolution is experiencing so abrupt and original a turn of events that we, as a party, may propose a voluntary compromise—true, not to the bourgeoisie, our direct and main class enemy, but to our nearest adversaries, the “ruling” petty-bourgeois democratic parties, the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks.

We may propose a compromise to these parties only by way of exception, only because a specific situation exists, which obviously will last only a very short time; and it seems to me we should do so.

The compromise, on our part, would consist of a return to the pre-July demand: All power to the Soviets and a government of Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks responsible to the Soviets.

At this moment, and only at this moment, perhaps only for a few days, or for a week or two, such a government might be set up and consolidated in a perfectly peaceful way. It is extremely probable that it would guarantee the peaceful advance of the whole Russian revolution, and provide unusually good chances for greater strides towards peace and the victory of socialism on the part of the world movement.

For the sake, and only for the sake, of such a peaceful development of the revolution—a possibility extremely rare in history and extremely valuable, a possibility that comes only in exceptionally rare cases—the Bolsheviks, partisans of world revolution and of revolutionary methods, may, and should, in my opinion, consent to such a compromise.

The compromise would amount to this: that the Bolsheviks, without making any claim to participate in the government (which is impossible for the internationalists until a dictatorship of the proletariat and the poor peasantry is actually realised), would refrain from demanding the immediate transfer of power to the proletariat and the poor peasants and from employing revolutionary methods of fighting for this demand. A condition, one that is self-evident and not new to the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks, would be complete freedom of propaganda and the convocation of the Constituent Assembly without further procrastination, or even at an earlier date than that appointed.

The Mensheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionaries, as the governmental bloc, would agree (assuming that the compromise is reached) to form a government responsible solely and exclusively to the Soviets, and also to the transfer of the entire power to the Soviets in the localities. This would constitute the “new” condition. No other condition would, I think, be advanced by the Bolsheviks, confident that, with full freedom of propaganda and with the immediate realisation of a new democracy in the composition of the Soviets (new elections) and in their functioning, the peaceful progress of the revolution and a peaceful solution of the party strife within the Soviets would be guaranteed.

Perhaps this is already impossible? Perhaps. But if there is even one chance in a hundred, the attempt to achieve such a possibility would still be worth while.

What would be gained from this “compromise” by each of the “contracting” parties, i.e., by the Bolsheviks, on the one hand, and by the bloc of Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks, on the other? If neither side gains anything, then the compromise must be recognised as impossible, and nothing more is to be said. However difficult that compromise may be at present (after July and August, two months equivalent to two decades in "peaceful," somnolent times), it seems to me there is a small chance of its being realised. This chance has been created by the decision of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks not to participate in a joint government with the Cadets.

The Bolsheviks would gain by securing the possibility of agitating freely for their views and of striving to win influence within the Soviets under conditions of real and complete democracy. In words, "everybody" now recognises this freedom for the Bolsheviks. But in reality it is impossible under a bourgeois government, or under a government in which the bourgeoisie participates, or under any government other than the Soviets. Under a Soviet government such freedom would be possible (we do not say it would be guaranteed with absolute certainty, but it would be possible). For the sake of such a possibility, in such difficult times as the present, it would be worth agreeing to a compromise with the Soviet majority of the present day. We have nothing to fear from real democracy, for the tide of events is on our side, and even the course of development of the currents within the hostile (to us) Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik parties confirms that we are right.

The Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries would gain in that they would at once obtain full possibility of carrying out the programme of their bloc with the support of an obviously overwhelming majority of the people, and in that they would guarantee themselves the "peaceful" use of their majority in the Soviets.

Of course, within this bloc, heterogeneous both because of the fact that it is a bloc and because the petty-bourgeois democrats are always less homogeneous than the bourgeoisie and the proletariat, two voices would probably make themselves heard.

One voice would say: "We cannot travel along the same road as the Bolsheviks and the revolutionary proletariat. The latter will make excessive demands anyway, and will entice the poor peasantry by demagoguery. It will demand peace and a rupture with the Allies. That is impossible. We are better off and safer with the bourgeoisie; we have not parted ways with it, you know, we have only quarrelled with it temporarily and only over the Kornilov incident. We have quarrelled, but we shall make it up. Moreover, the Bolsheviks are not 'ceding' us anything, for their attempts at insurrection are anyway doomed to failure, like the Commune of 1871." *

The other voice would say: "The allusion to the Commune is very superficial and even foolish. For, in the first place, the Bolsheviks have after all learnt something since 1871; they would not neglect to seize the bank, they would not refrain from marching on Versailles; and under such conditions even the Commune might have been victorious. Besides, the Commune could not offer the people immediately what the Bolsheviks would be able to offer if they became the power, namely, land to the peasants, an immediate proposal for peace, genuine control over production, an honest peace with the Ukrainians, Finns, etc. The Bolsheviks, to use a slang expression, have ten times more 'trumps' in their hands than the Commune had. In the second place, a Commune, after all, would involve a serious civil war, the retardation of peaceful cultural development for a long time afterwards, a freer opportunity for the operations and machinations of the MacMahons and Kornilovs—and such operations are a menace to our whole bourgeois society. Is it good sense to run the risk of a Commune?

"But a Commune in Russia is unavoidable if we do not take power into our hands, if the situation remains as grave as it was from May 19 (6) to September 13 (August 31). Every revolutionary worker and soldier will inevitably think about the Commune and believe in it; he will inevitably attempt to realise it; for he will argue as follows: 'The people are perishing; war, famine and ruin are becoming ever more acute. Only the Commune can save us. Let us then perish, let us all die, but let us establish the Commune.' Such thoughts are inevitable among the workers, and it will not be as easy to crush the Commune now as it was in 1871. The Russian Commune will have allies all over the world, allies a hundred times stronger than those the Commune had in 1871. . . . Is it good sense to run the risk of a Commune? Neither can I agree that the Bolsheviks, strictly speaking, are not ceding us anything by their compromise. For in all civilised countries, civilised ministers during time of war value highly every agreement with the proletariat, however slight. They value it very, very highly. And these are men of affairs, real ministers. Now the Bolsheviks are rapidly becoming stronger, notwithstanding repressions, notwithstanding the weakness of their press. . . . Is it good sense for us to run the risk of a Commune?

"We have a safe majority; the awakening of the poor peasantry is still far off; we are safe for our lifetime. I do not believe that in a peasant country the majority will follow the extremists. And against a recognised majority, in a truly democratic republic, revolt is impossible." This is what the second voice would say.

Perhaps there would be a third voice coming from among the adherents of Martov or Spiridonova, which would say: "It makes me indignant, 'comrades,' that both of you, talking of the Commune and the possibility of its taking place, unhesitatingly side with its opponents. In one form or another, both of you are on the side of those who suppressed the Commune. I will not undertake to agitate in favour of the Commune; I cannot promise beforehand to fight in its ranks as every Bolshevik will do; still, I must say that if the Commune, in spite of my efforts, does flare up, I shall rather help its defenders than its opponents. . . ."

The medley of voices in the "bloc" is great and unavoidable, for among the petty-bourgeois democrats a host of shades is represented—from the complete bourgeois, entirely eligible for a post in the government, to the semi-pauper who is as yet incapable of adopting the position of the proletarian. What will be the result of this discord of voices at any given moment, nobody knows.

* * *

The above lines were written on Friday, September 14 (1), but owing to accidental causes (under Kerensky, history will say, not all the Bolsheviks were free to choose their domicile) they did not reach the editorial office that day. And after reading Saturday's and today's, Sunday's, papers, I say to myself: Apparently, the proposal for a compromise is already too late. Apparently, the few days in which a peaceful development was still possible have already passed. Yes, everything points to the fact that they have already passed. In one way or another, Kerensky will abandon both the Socialist-Revolutionary Party and the Socialist-Revolutionaries themselves, and will consolidate his position with the help of the bourgeoisie without the Socialist-Revolutionaries, thanks to their inaction. . . . Yes, to all appearances the days when by chance the road of peaceful development became possible have already passed. All that remains is to send these notes to the editor with the request to have them entitled "Belated Thoughts." Even belated thoughts are perhaps at times not devoid of interest.

September 14-16 (1-3), 1917

THE BOLSHEVIKS MUST ASSUME POWER *

A Letter to the Central Committee and to the Petrograd and Moscow Committees of the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party

HAVING obtained a majority in the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies of both capitals, the Bolsheviks can, and must, take over the power of government.

They can do so because the active majority of the revolutionary elements of the people of both capitals is large enough to carry the masses, to overcome the resistance of the adversary, to smash him and to conquer power and retain it. For, by immediately proposing a democratic peace, by immediately giving the land to the peasants and by re-establishing the democratic institutions and liberties which have been mangled and shattered by Kerensky, the Bolsheviks will create a government which nobody will be able to overthrow.

The majority of the people are on our side. This was proved by the long and painful course of events from May 19 (6) to September 13 (August 31) and to September 25 (12). The majority gained in the Soviets of the capitals was a result of the fact that the people have developed in our direction. The vacillation of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks and the increase in the number of internationalists within their ranks prove the same thing.

The Democratic Conference represents not a majority of the revolutionary people, but only the compromising upper stratum of the petty bourgeoisie. One must not be deceived by the election figures; elections prove nothing. Compare the elections to the City Dumas of Petrograd and Moscow  with the elections to the Soviets. Compare the elections in Moscow with the Moscow strike of August 25 (12). Here we have objective data regarding the majority of revolutionary elements who are leading the masses.

The Democratic Conference is deceiving the peasants: it is giving them neither peace nor land.

A Bolshevik government alone will satisfy the demands of the peasantry.

* * *

Why must the Bolsheviks assume power now?

Because the impending surrender of Petrograd will render our chances a hundred times less favourable.

And while the army is headed by Kerensky and Co. it is not in our power to prevent the surrender of Petrograd.

Neither can we "wait" for the Constituent Assembly, for by surrendering Petrograd Kerensky and Co. can always frustrate the convocation of the Constituent Assembly. Our Party alone, having assumed power, can secure the convocation of the Constituent Assembly: and, having assumed power, it will accuse the other parties of procrastination and will be able to substantiate its accusations.

A separate peace between the British and German imperialists * must be prevented, and can be prevented, but only by quick action.

The people are tired of the vacillations of the Mensheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionaries. Our victory in the capitals alone will draw the peasants over to our side.

* * *

We are concerned not with the "day," nor with the "moment" of insurrection in the narrow sense of the word. That will be decided by the common voice of those who are in contact with the workers and soldiers, with the masses.

The point is that at the Democratic Conference our Party has virtually its own congress, and this congress (whether it wishes to or not) must decide the fate of the revolution.

The point is to make the task clear to the Party. An armed insurrection in Petrograd and Moscow (with their regions), the conquest of power and the overthrow of the government must be placed on the order of the day. We must consider how to agitate for this without expressly saying as much in the press.

We must remember and weigh the words of Marx: "Insurrection is an art."

* * *

It would be naive to wait for a "formal" majority for the Bolsheviks; no revolution ever waits for that. Kerensky and Co. are not waiting either; they are preparing to surrender Petrograd. The wretched vacillations of the Democratic Conference are bound to exhaust the patience of the workers of Petrograd and Moscow. History will not forgive us if we do not assume power now.

There is no apparatus? There is an apparatus: the Soviets and the democratic organisations. The international situation just now, on the eve of the conclusion of a separate peace between the British and the Germans, is in our favour. If we propose peace to the nations now we shall win.

Power must be assumed in Moscow and in Petrograd at once (it does not matter which begins; even Moscow may begin); we shall win absolutely and unquestionably.

September 25-27 (12-14), 1917

MARXISM AND INSURRECTION ¹

A Letter to the Central Committee of the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party

ONE of the most vicious and probably most widespread distortions of Marxism practised by the prevailing "Socialist" parties consists in the opportunist lie that preparations for insurrection and generally the treatment of insurrection as an art are "Blanquism."

Bernstein, the leader of opportunism, earned himself a wretched notoriety by accusing Marxism of Blanquism, and when our present-day opportunists cry Blanquism they do not improve on or "enrich" the meagre "ideas" of Bernstein one jot.

Marxists are accused of Blanquism for regarding insurrection as an art! Can there be a more flagrant distortion of the truth, when not a single Marxist will deny that it was Marx who expressed himself on this score in the most definite, precise and categorical manner; that it was Marx who called insurrection precisely an art, saying that it must be treated as an art, that the first success must be gained and that one must proceed from success to success, never ceasing the offensive against the enemy, taking every advantage of his confusion, etc., etc.?*

To be successful, insurrection must rely not upon conspiracy and not upon a party, but upon the advanced class. That is the first point. Insurrection must rely upon the revolutionary spirit of the people. That is the second point. Insurrection must rely upon the crucial moment in the history of the growing revolution, when the activity of the advanced ranks of the people is at its height, and when the vacillations in the ranks of the enemies and in the ranks of the weak, half-hearted and irresolute friends of the revolution are strongest. That is the third point. And these three factors in the attitude towards insurrection distinguish Marxism from Blanquism.

¹ See note to p. 215.*—Ed.

But when these factors are operating it is a betrayal of Marxism and a betrayal of the revolution to refuse to regard insurrection as an art.

In order to show that the present moment is one in which the Party is obliged to admit that insurrection has been placed upon the order of the day by the whole course of objective events, and that it must treat insurrection as an art, it will perhaps be best to use the method of comparison, and to draw a parallel between July 16-17 (3-4) and the September days.

In the days of July 16-17 (3-4) it was possible to argue without trespassing against the truth that the right thing to do was to take power, for our enemies would in any case accuse us of rebellion and treat us like rebels. However, to have concluded that we could have seized power at that time would have been wrong because the objective conditions for a successful insurrection did not exist.

1) We still lacked the support of the class which is the vanguard of the revolution.

We still did not have a majority among the workers and soldiers of the capitals. Now, we have a majority in both Soviets. It was created solely by the history of July and August, by the experience of the ruthless treatment meted out to the Bolsheviks, and by the experience of the Kornilov affair.

2) There was no rising revolutionary spirit at that time among the people. There is that spirit now, after the Kornilov affair, as is proved by the situation in the provinces and by the seizure of power by the Soviets in many localities.

3) At that time there was no vacillation on any serious political scale among our enemies and among the irresolute petty bourgeoisie. Now their vacillation is enormous. Our main enemy, Allied and world imperialism (for world imperialism is being led by the "Allies"), has begun to waver between a war to a victorious conclusion and a separate peace directed against Russia. Our petty-bourgeois democrats, having clearly lost their majority among the people, have begun to vacillate enormously, and have rejected a bloc, i.e., a coalition, with the Cadets.

4) An insurrection on July 16-17 (3-4) would have been a mistake because we could not have retained power either physically or politically. We could not have retained it physically in spite of the fact that at certain moments Petrograd was in our hands, because at that time our workers and soldiers would not have fought and died for the possession of Petrograd. There was not at that time that "savageness," nor that fierce hatred both of the Kerenskys and of the Tseretellis and Chernovs. Our people still had not been tempered by the experience of the persecution of the Bolsheviks in which the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks participated.

We would not have retained power politically on July 16-17 (3-4), because before the Kornilov affair the army and provinces might, and would, have marched against Petrograd.

The picture is now entirely different.

We have the following of the majority of a class, the vanguard of the revolution, the vanguard of the people, which is capable of carrying the masses with it.

We have the following of the majority of the people; for Chernov's resignation, while by no means the only symptom, is the most striking and obvious symptom that the peasantry will not receive land from a bloc with the Socialist-Revolutionaries (or from the Socialist-Revolutionaries themselves). And that is the central reason for the popular character of the revolution.

We have the advantage of a party that firmly knows the path it must follow, whereas imperialism as a whole and the bloc of the Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries are vacillating incredibly.

Our victory is assured, for the people are bordering on desperation, and we can show the people a sure way out; for during the "Kornilov days" we demonstrated to the people the value of our leadership, and subsequently proposed to the politicians of the bloc a compromise which they rejected, although their vacillations continued unremittingly.

It would be a profound mistake to think that our offer of a compromise has not yet been rejected, and that the "Democratic Conference" may still accept it. The compromise was proposed by a party to parties; it could not have been proposed in any other way. It was rejected by the parties. The Democratic Conference is a Conference and nothing more. One thing must not be forgotten, namely, that at the Conference the majority of the revolutionary people, the poor and embittered peasantry, are not represented. It is a Conference of a minority of the people—that obvious truth must not be forgotten. It would be a profound error, it would be sheer parliamentary cretinism on our part, were we to regard the Democratic Conference as a parliament; for even if it were to proclaim itself a parliament, the sovereign parliament of the revolution, it would not be able to decide anything. The power of decision lies outside of the Conference; it lies in the working class quarters of Petrograd and Moscow.

All the objective conditions for a successful insurrection exist. We have the advantage of a situation in which only our success in the insurrection can put an end to that most painful thing on earth, vacillation, which has worn the people out; a situation in which only the success of our insurrection can foil the game of a separate peace directed against the revolution by publicly proposing a fuller, juster and earlier peace to the benefit of the revolution.

Finally, our Party alone can save Petrograd by a successful insurrection; for if our proposal for peace is rejected, if we do not secure even an armistice, then we shall become “defencists,” we shall place ourselves at the head of the war parties, we shall be the “war party” par excellence, and we shall fight the war in a truly revolutionary manner. We shall take all the bread and shoes away from the capitalists. We shall leave them only crusts, we shall dress them in bast shoes. We shall send all the bread and shoes to the front.

And we shall save Petrograd.

The resources, both material and spiritual, for a truly revolutionary war in Russia are still immense; the chances are a hundred to one that the Germans will grant us at least an armistice. And to secure an armistice now would in itself mean beating the whole world.

Having recognised that an insurrection on the part of the workers of Petrograd and Moscow is absolutely necessary in order to save the revolution and in order to save Russia from being "separately" divided up among the imperialists of both coalitions, we must, first, adapt our political tactics at the Conference to the conditions of the growing insurrection, and, secondly, we must show that our acceptance of the idea of Marx that insurrection must be regarded as an art is not merely a verbal acceptance.

At the Conference, we must immediately set about consolidating the Bolshevik fraction, without striving after numbers, and without fearing to leave the waverers in the camp of the waverers: they are more useful to the cause of the revolution there than in the camp of the resolute and devoted fighters.

We must prepare a brief declaration in the name of the Bolsheviks, sharply emphasising the irrelevance of long speeches and of "speeches" in general, the necessity for immediate action in order to save the revolution, the absolute necessity for a complete break with the bourgeoisie, for the removal of the whole of the present government, for a complete severance of relations with the Anglo-French imperialists, who are preparing a "separate" partition of Russia, and for the immediate transfer of the whole power to the revolutionary democracy headed by the revolutionary proletariat. Our declaration must consist of the briefest and bluntest formulation of this conclusion accompanied by a programme of proposals: peace for the peoples, land for the peasants, the confiscation of outrageous profits, and a check on the outrageous sabotage of production by the capitalists.

The briefer and blunter the declaration the better. Only, two other important points must be clearly indicated in it, namely, that the people are worn out by vacillation, that they are exhausted by the irresoluteness of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks; and that we are definitely breaking with these parties because they have betrayed the revolution.

Further. By immediately proposing a peace without annexations, by breaking immediately with the Allied imperialists and with all imperialists, either we shall immediately obtain an armistice, or the entire revolutionary proletariat will rally to the defence of the country, and a truly just, truly revolutionary war will then be waged by the revolutionary democracy under the leadership of the proletariat.

Having announced this declaration, and having appealed for decisions and not talk, for action and not resolution-writing, our whole fraction must proceed to the factories and the barracks. Their place is there; the pulse of life is there; the force that will save the revolution is there; the motive force of the Democratic Conference is there.

There, in impassioned speeches, we must explain our programme and put the alternative: either the Conference adopts it in its entirety, or else insurrection. There is no middle course. Delay is impossible. The revolution is perishing.

By putting the question thus, by concentrating our entire fraction in the factories and barracks, we shall be able to decide the best moment to launch the insurrection.

And in order to treat insurrection in a Marxist way, i.e., as an art, we must at the same time, without losing a single moment, organise a general staff of the insurrectionary detachments; we must distribute our forces; we must move the loyal regiments to the most important strategic points; we must surround the Alexandrinsky Theatre; we must occupy the Peter and Paul fortress;* we must arrest the general staff and the government; against the military cadets and the Savage Division we must move such detachments as will rather die than allow the enemy to approach the centre of the city; we must mobilise the armed workers and call upon them to engage in a last desperate fight; we must occupy the telegraph and telephone stations at once, quarter our general staff of the insurrection at the central telephone station and connect it by telephone with all the factories, regiments, points of armed fighting, etc.

Of course, this is all by way of example, in order to illustrate the fact that at the present moment it is impossible to remain loyal to Marxism and to the revolution without regarding insurrection as an art.

September 26-27 (13-14), 1917

THE CRISIS HAS MATURED ¹

THE beginning of October (end of September) undoubtedly marked a definite turning point in the history of the Russian revolution and, to all appearances, of the world revolution also.

The world working class revolution began with the action of individuals, whose supreme courage represented everything honest that remains of the decayed official "Socialism," which is in reality social-chauvinism. Liebknecht in Germany, Adler in Austria, MacLean in England—these are the best known names of those isolated heroes who have taken upon themselves the arduous mission of being the forerunners of the world revolution.

The second stage in the historical preparation of this revolution was a widespread mass ferment, expressing itself in the split of the official parties, in illegal publications and in street demonstrations. The protest against the war became stronger, and the number of victims of government persecution increased. The prisons of countries famed for their observance of law and even for their freedom—Germany, France, Italy, and Great Britain—became filled with tens and hundreds of internationalists, opponents of the war and advocates of a working class revolution.

The third stage has now begun. This stage may be called the eve of revolution. Mass arrests of Party leaders in free Italy, and particularly the beginning of mutinies in the German army, are indisputable symptoms that a great and crucial moment is at hand, that we are on the eve of a world-wide revolution.

There can be no doubt that even before this there were isolated cases of mutiny among the troops in Germany, but they were so small, so isolated and weak, that it was possible to hush them up—and that was the main thing in order to check the mass contagion of seditious action. Finally, a similar movement developed in the navy which it was impossible to hush up, despite all the severities of the German military regime, elaborated with such amazing minuteness of detail and observed with such incredible pedantry.

¹ See note to p. 215.*—Ed.

Doubt is out of the question. We are on the threshold of a world proletarian revolution. And since we, the Russian Bolsheviks, alone of all the proletarian internationalists of the world, enjoy a comparatively large measure of freedom, since we have a legal party and a score or so of papers, since we have the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies of the capitals on our side, and since we have the support of a majority of the masses of the people in a time of revolution, to us indeed may the saying be applied: to whom much has been given, of him much shall be demanded.

II

The crucial point of the revolution in Russia has undoubtedly arrived.

In a peasant country, and under a revolutionary, republican government, which enjoys the support of the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik parties, parties that only recently dominated the petty-bourgeois democracy, a peasant revolt is developing.

It is incredible, but it is a fact.

And we Bolsheviks are not surprised by this fact: we have always maintained that the government of the notorious "coalition" with the bourgeoisie was a government of betrayal of democracy and of the revolution, that it was a government of imperialist slaughter, a government that protected the capitalists and landlords from the people.

Owing to the deception practised by the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks, there still exists in Russia, under a republic and in time of revolution, a government of capitalists and landlords side by side with the Soviets. Such is the bitter and sinister fact. Is it then a matter for surprise that in Russia, in view of the incredible hardship inflicted on the people by the dragging out of the imperialist war and by its consequences, a peasant revolt has begun and is spreading? Is it a matter for surprise that the enemies of the Bolsheviks, the leaders of the official Socialist-Revolutionary Party, the very party that supported the "coalition" all along, the party that until the last few days or weeks had the majority of the people on its side, the party that continues to harry and abuse the "new" Socialist-Revolutionaries, who have realised that the policy of coalition is a betrayal of the interests of the peasants—is it a matter for surprise that these leaders of the official Socialist-Revolutionary Party, in an editorial in their official organ, Dyelo Naroda, of October 12 (September 29), wrote as follows:

"... Practically nothing has been done up to the present to put an end to the conditions of servitude that still prevail in the country districts of Central Russia.... The bill for the regulation of land relations in rural areas, which was introduced in the Provisional Government long ago, and which has even passed such a purgatory as the Judicial Conference, has got hopelessly stuck in some bureau.... Are we not right in asserting that our republican government is still a long way from having rid itself of the old habits of the tsarist administration, and that the dead hand of Stolypin is still strongly felt in the methods of the revolutionary ministers?"

This is written by the official Socialist-Revolutionaries! Just think: the supporters of the coalition are forced to admit that in a peasant country, after seven months of revolution, "practically nothing has been done to put an end to the servitude" of the peasants, to their enslavement to the landlords! These Socialist-Revolutionaries are forced to call their colleague, Kerensky, and his gang of ministers "Stolypinists."

Could we have coming from the camp of our opponents more eloquent testimony to the fact not only that the coalition has collapsed and that the official Socialist-Revolutionaries who tolerate Kerensky have become a party hostile to the people, hostile to the peasant, and counter-revolutionary, but also that the whole Russian revolution has now reached a state of crisis?

A peasant revolt in a peasant country against the government of Kerensky, a Socialist-Revolutionary, Nikitin and Gvozdev, Mensheviks, and other ministers representing capital and the interests of the landlords! The crushing of this revolt by military force by a republican government.

In the face of such facts, can one be a conscientious partisan of the proletariat and yet deny that a crisis has matured, that the revolution is passing through an extremely critical moment, that the victory of the government over the peasant revolt would now sound the death knell of the revolution, the final triumph of the Kornilovists?

III

It is obvious that if in a peasant country, after seven months of a democratic republic, matters have come to the pass of a peasant revolt, it is irrefutable proof that the revolution is suffering nationwide collapse, that it is passing through a crisis of unprecedented severity, and that the forces of counter-revolution have gone the full limit.

That is obvious. In the face of such a fact as a peasant revolt all other political symptoms, even were they to contradict the fact that a national crisis is maturing, would have no significance whatsoever.

But, on the contrary, all the symptoms do indicate that a nation-wide crisis has matured.

After the agrarian question, the most important question in the state life of Russia is the national question, particularly for the petty-bourgeois masses of the population. And at the "Democratic" Conference, which was packed by Messrs. Tseretelli and Co., we find that the "national" *curia*¹ takes second place for radicalism, yielding only to the trade unions, and exceeding the curia of the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies in the percentage of votes cast against the coalition (40 out of 55). The Kerensky government—which is suppressing the peasant revolt—is withdrawing the revolutionary troops from Finland in order to strengthen the reactionary Finnish bourgeoisie. In the Ukraine, the conflicts of the Ukrainians in general, and of the Ukrainian troops in particular, with the government are becoming more and more frequent.

Furthermore, let us take the army, which in war-time is of vital importance to the life of the state. We find that the army in Finland and the Baltic fleet have completely parted ways with the government. We have the testimony of the officer Dubasov, a non-Bolshevik, who speaks in the name of the whole front and declares in a manner more revolutionary than that of any Bolshevik that the soldiers will not fight any longer.* We have the governmental reports stating that the soldiers are in a state of "agitation" and that it is impossible to guarantee the maintenance of "order" (i.e., the participation of the troops in the suppression of the peasant revolt). We have, finally, the voting in Moscow, where fourteen thousand out of seventeen thousand soldiers voted for the Bolsheviks.

¹ Curia—in this case, delegate group.—Ed. Eng. ed.

This vote in the elections to the Borough Dumas in Moscow¹ is one of the most striking symptoms of the profound change which has taken place in the general mood of the nation. It is generally known that Moscow is more petty-bourgeois than Petrograd. It is a fact frequently corroborated and indisputable that the Moscow proletariat has an incomparably greater number of connections with the countryside, that it enjoys greater peasant sympathy and is closer to the sentiments of the peasant.

Yet in Moscow the vote cast for the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks dropped from 70 per cent in June to 18 per cent. The petty bourgeoisie has turned away from the coalition; the people have turned away from it; of that there can be no doubt. The Cadets have increased their strength from 17 per cent to 30 per cent, but they remain a minority, a hopeless minority, notwithstanding the fact that they have been obviously joined by the "Right" Socialist-Revolutionaries, and the "Right" Mensheviks. *Russkiye Vyedomosti*² states that the absolute number of votes cast for the Cadets fell from 67,000 to 62,000. Only the vote cast for the Bolsheviks increased—from 34,000 to 82,000. They received 47 per cent of the total vote. There can be no shadow of doubt that we, together with the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries, now have a majority in the Soviets, in the army, and in the country.

Among the symptoms that have not only a symptomatic, but also a real significance must be counted the fact that the army of railroad and postal employees, who are of immense importance from the general, economic, political and military point of view, continue to be in sharp conflict with the government, while even the Menshevik defencists are dissatisfied with "their" minister, Nikitin, and the official Socialist-Revolutionaries call Kerensky and Co. "Stolypinists." Is it not clear that such "support" to the government by the Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries can have only a negative value?

¹ See note to p. 215.—Ed.

² Russian News—the Moscow organ of the Cadets.—Ed.

IV •

V

Ay, the leaders of the Central Executive Committee are pursuing the correct tactics of defending the bourgeoisie and the landlords. And there is not the slightest doubt that if the Bolsheviks allowed themselves to be caught in the trap of constitutional illusions—"faith" in the Congress of Soviets and in the convocation of the Constituent Assembly, "waiting" for the Congress of Soviets, and so forth—they would be miserable traitors to the proletarian cause.

They would be traitors to the cause, for by their conduct they would be betraying the German revolutionary workers who have started a revolt in the fleet. To "wait" for the Congress of Soviets and so forth under such circumstances would be a betrayal of internationalism, a betrayal of the cause of the international socialist revolution.

For internationalism consists not in phrases, not in protestations of solidarity, and not in resolutions, but in deeds.

The Bolsheviks would be traitors to the peasantry, for to tolerate the suppression of the peasant revolt by a government which even Dyelo Naroda compares with the Stolypinists would be to ruin the whole revolution, irrevocably. An outcry is raised about anarchy and about the increasing apathy of the masses; but what else can the masses be but apathetic to the elections, when the peasantry has been driven to revolt while the so-called "revolutionary democrats" are patiently tolerating its suppression by military force?

The Bolsheviks would be traitors to democracy and to freedom; for to tolerate the suppression of the peasant revolt at such a moment would mean allowing the elections to the Constituent Assembly to be juggled in the same way—and even more heinously and crudely—as the "Democratic Conference" and the "Pre-parliament"¹ were juggled.

¹ See note to p. 215.*—Ed.

The crisis has matured. The whole future of the Russian revolution is at stake. The honour of the Bolshevik Party is in question. The future of the international workers' revolution for socialism is at stake.

The crisis has matured. . . .

N. LENIN

October 12 (September 29), 1917

* * *

Everything to this point may be published, but what follows is to be distributed among the members of the Central Committee, the Petrograd Committee, the Moscow Committee, and the Soviets.

VI

What, then, is to be done? We must aussprechen, was ist, state the facts, admit the truth that there is a tendency, or an opinion, in our Central Committee and among the leaders of our Party which favours waiting for the Congress of Soviets, and is opposed to the immediate seizure of power and an immediate insurrection.* That tendency, or opinion, must be overcome.

Otherwise the Bolsheviks will cover themselves with eternal shame and destroy themselves as a party.

For to miss such a moment and to "wait" for the Congress of Soviets would be utter idiocy, or sheer treachery.

It would be sheer treachery towards the German workers. Are we to wait until their revolution begins? In that case even the Lieber-Dans  would be in favour of "supporting" it. But it cannot begin as long as Kerensky, Kishkin and Co. are in power.

It would be sheer treachery towards the peasantry. To allow the revolt of the peasants to be suppressed when we control the Soviets of both capitals would be to lose, and justly lose, every ounce of the peasants' confidence; we would become equal in the eyes of the peasants to the Lieber-Dans and other scoundrels.

To "wait" for the Congress of Soviets would be utter idiocy, for it would mean losing weeks at a time when weeks and even days decide everything. It would mean faint-heartedly renouncing the seizure of power, for on November 14-15 (1-2) it will have become impossible (both politically and technically, since the Cossacks would be mobilised for the day of the revolt so foolishly "appointed" ¹).

To "wait" for the Congress of Soviets is idiocy, for the Congress will give nothing, and can give nothing!

"Moral" importance? Strange indeed, to talk of the "importance" of resolutions and negotiations with the Lieber-Dans when we know that the Soviets support the peasants and that the peasant revolt is being suppressed! That would be reducing the Soviets to the status of wretched talkshops. First defeat Kerensky, then call the Congress.

The success of the insurrection is now guaranteed for the Bolsheviks: 1) we can (if we do not "wait" for the Soviet Congress) launch a sudden attack from three points—from Petrograd, from Moscow and from the Baltic fleet;² 2) we have slogans that guarantee us support: Down with the government that is suppressing the revolt of the peasants against the landlords! 3) we have a majority in the country; 4) the disorganisation among the Mensheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionaries is complete; 5) we are technically in a position to seize power in Moscow (where the start might even be made, so as to catch the enemy unawares); 6) we have thousands of armed workers and soldiers in Petrograd who could at once seize the Winter Palace, the general staff, the telephone exchange and the large printing establishments. Nothing will be able to drive us out of these positions, while agitational work in the army will be such as to make it impossible to combat this government of peace, of land for the peasants, and so forth.

If we were to attack at once, suddenly, from three points, Petrograd, Moscow and the Baltic fleet, the chances are a hundred to one that we would succeed with smaller sacrifices than on July 16-18 (3-5), because the troops will not advance against a government of peace. Even though Kerensky already has "loyal" cavalry, etc., in Petrograd, if we were to attack from two sides, and with the sympathy of the army on our side, he would be compelled to surrender. If with such chances as we have at present we do not seize power, then all talk of transferring the power to the Soviets becomes a lie.

¹ To "convene" the Congress of Soviets for November 2 (October 20), in order to decide upon the seizure of power—how does that differ from foolishly "appointing" an uprising? We can seize power now, whereas on November 2-11 (October 20-29) you will not be allowed to seize power.

² What has the Party done to study the disposition of the troops, etc? What has it done to conduct the insurrection as an "art"? Mere talk in the Central Committee, and so on!

To refrain from seizing power now, to "wait," to indulge in talk in the Central Executive Committee, to confine ourselves to "fighting for the organ" (the Soviet), "fighting for the Congress," is to doom the revolution to failure.

In view of the fact that the Central Committee has even left unanswered the persistent demands I have been making for such a policy ever since the beginning of the Democratic Conference, in view of the fact that the central organ is deleting from my articles all references to such glaring errors on the part of the Bolsheviks as the shameful decision to participate in the Pre-parliament, the presentation of seats to the Mensheviks in the presidium of the Soviet, etc., etc.—I am compelled to regard this as a "subtle" hint of the unwillingness of the Central Committee even to consider this question, a subtle hint that I should keep my mouth shut, and as a proposal for me to retire.

I am compelled to tender my resignation from the Central Committee, which I hereby do,* reserving for myself the freedom to agitate among the rank and file of the Party and at the Party Congress.

For it is my profound conviction that if we "wait" for the Congress of Soviets and let the moment pass now, we shall ruin the revolution.

N. LENIN

October 12 (September 29)

P. S. There are a number of facts which go to prove that even the Cossack regiments will not move against a government of peace! And how many are they? Where are they? And will not the entire army dispatch units for our support?

October 12 (September 29), 1917

FROM A PUBLICIST'S DIARY

THE MISTAKES OF OUR PARTY *

Friday, October 5 (September 22), 1917

THE more one reflects on the significance of the so-called Democratic Conference, the more attentively one observes it as an onlooker—and it is said that the onlooker sees most of the game—the more firmly convinced one becomes that our Party committed a mistake by participating in it. It should have been boycotted. It will be asked, what is the use of analysing this question? The past cannot be undone. But to make such an objection in regard to past tactics is obviously unjustifiable. We have always condemned, and as Marxists we are obliged to condemn, “hand-to-mouth” tactics. Momentary successes are not good enough for us. And generally plans for a minute or a day are not good enough for us. We must constantly test ourselves by studying the chain of political events in their entirety, their causal relations and their results. By analysing the errors of yesterday we shall learn to avoid errors today and tomorrow.

A new revolution is manifestly developing in the country, a revolution of different classes (as compared with those which made the revolution against tsarism). At that time it was a revolution of the proletariat, the peasantry and the bourgeoisie in alliance with Anglo-French finance capital against tsarism.

The revolution now developing is a revolution of the proletariat and the majority of the peasants, namely, the poor peasantry, against the bourgeoisie, against its ally, Anglo-French finance capital, and against its government apparatus headed by the Bonapartist Kerensky.

We shall not dwell at present on the facts which testify to the development of a new revolution, since, judging by the articles in our central organ, Rabochy Put, the Party has already made clear its view on this point. The development of a new revolution is a phenomenon which, it seems, is generally recognised by the Party. Of course, it will be necessary to summarise the facts of this development, but that must form the subject of other articles.

At the present moment it is more important to direct attention chiefly to the class differences between the old and the new revolution, to an examination of the political situation and of our tasks from the point of view of the fundamental factor, i.e., the relation of classes. At that time, during the first revolution, the vanguard consisted of the workers and the soldiers, i.e., of the proletariat and the advanced sections of the peasantry.

This vanguard carried with it not only many of the worst, the vacillating elements of the petty bourgeoisie (remember the indecision of the Mensheviks and the Trudoviki over the question of a republic), but also the monarchist party of the Cadets, the liberal bourgeoisie, which it made republican. Why was such a transformation possible?

Because for the bourgeoisie economic domination is everything, while the form of political domination is subsidiary. The bourgeoisie can dominate just as well under a republic; indeed, its domination is even more secure under a republic, since, no matter what changes take place in the composition of the government or in the composition and the grouping of the ruling parties, under that political order they do not affect the interests of the bourgeoisie.

Of course, the bourgeoisie stood, and will stand, for a monarchy, because the grosser, the military, form of protection of capital which is exercised by monarchist institutions is more obvious and more to the taste of the capitalists and landlords. But, when strong pressure was exercised "from below," the bourgeoisie always and everywhere "reconciled" itself to a republic, if only to preserve its economic domination intact.

Now, however, the proletariat and the poor peasantry, i.e., the majority of the people, have assumed such a relation towards the bourgeoisie and towards "Allied" (and world) imperialism that they cannot possibly carry the bourgeoisie along with them. Moreover, the leaders of the petty bourgeoisie and the more wealthy strata of the democratic petty bourgeoisie are obviously opposed to a new revolution. This fact is so patent that it is not necessary to dwell on it now. Messieurs the Lieber-Dans, Tseretellis and Chernovs provide a clear illustration of the fact.

The relation of classes has changed. That is the whole essence of the matter.

Other classes now stand facing each other, "on the two sides of the barricade."

That is the main thing.

That, and that alone, is the scientific justification for speaking of a new revolution, which—arguing purely theoretically, in the abstract—might have been accomplished legally if, for instance, the Constituent Assembly, convoked by the bourgeoisie, had proved to have a majority opposed to the bourgeoisie, a majority of the parties of the workers and the poor peasants.

The objective interrelation of classes, the part they play (economically and politically) both outside and inside representative institutions of a given type; the rise or fall of the revolution; the relation between extra-parliamentary and parliamentary methods of struggle—these are the chief and fundamental objective factors which must be taken into account if the tactics of boycott or participation are to be decided not arbitrarily, and not according to one's "sympathies," but according to Marxist methods.

The experience of our revolution clearly indicates the Marxist method of approach to the question of a boycott.

Why was the boycott of the Bulygin Duma tactically correct? ¹

Because it was in accordance with the actual relation of social forces in their development. It sounded the note of the rising revolution for the overthrow of the old order, which, in order to divert the people from the revolution, wanted to convoke a compromising, clumsily counterfeited institution (the Bulygin Duma), offering not the slightest prospect of making any real beginnings of parliamentarism. The non-parliamentary methods of struggle at the disposal of the proletariat and the peasantry were more effective. These were the factors which determined the tactics of boycotting the Bulygin Duma—correct tactics which took the objective situation into account.

¹ See note to p. 208.—Ed.

Why were the tactics of boycotting the Third Duma mistaken?¹

Because they depended solely on the “striking effect” of the boycott slogan and on the loathing for the brutally reactionary character of the “pigsty” of the regime of June 3.* But the actual situation, on the one hand, was that the revolution was in a state of extreme decline and was still declining. The possession of a parliamentary base (even within the “pigsty”) was of tremendous political importance for the revival of the revolution, since extra-parliamentary opportunities for propaganda, agitation and organisation were either non-existent or extremely inadequate. On the other hand, the brutally reactionary character of the Third Duma did not prevent it from serving as an organ of the true relation of classes, namely, a Stolypin combination of the monarchy and the bourgeoisie. The country had to live through this new relation of classes.

It was these factors that went to shape the tactics of participating in the Third Duma, tactics which correctly estimated the objective situation.

One has only to reflect on these lessons from experience, on the conditions which go to determine a Marxist solution of the question of boycott or participation, in order to become convinced of the absolute falsity of the tactics of participating in the “Democratic Conference,” the “Democratic Council,” or in the Pre-parliament.

On the one hand, we have the development of a new revolution. War is in the ascendant. Extra-parliamentary opportunities for propaganda, agitation and organisation are tremendous. The value of the “parliamentary” tribune in this Pre-parliament is insignificant. On the other hand, this Pre-parliament neither expresses nor “serves” any new relation of classes; for instance, the peasantry is here worse represented than in the already existing organs (the Soviets of Peasants’ Deputies). The Pre-parliament is essentially a Bonapartist fraud, not only in the sense that the filthy gang of Lieber-Dans, Tseretellis and Chérnovs, in conjunction with Kerensky and Co., have stacked and faked this Tseretelli-Bulygin Duma, but also in the deeper sense that the only aim of the Pre-parliament is to trick the masses, to fool the workers and peasants, to divert them from the new and growing revolution, and to throw dust in the eyes of the oppressed classes by decking in a new garb the old, bedraggled, threadbare "coalition" with the bourgeoisie already experienced (in other words, the transformation of Messrs. Tseretelli and Co. by the bourgeoisie into jesters who help to keep the people in subjection to imperialism in the imperialist war).

¹ See note to p. 208.—Ed.

"We are weak now," the tsar said to his feudal landlords in August 1905. "Our power is shaky. The tide of the workers' and peasants' revolution is rising. We must fool the simpleton. We must dangle a carrot before his eyes. . . ."

"We are weak now," the present "tsar," the Bonapartist Kerensky, says to the Cadets, to the non-party Tit Tityches,¹ to the Plekhanovs, Breshkovskayas and Co. "Our power is shaky. The tide of the workers' and peasants' revolution against the bourgeoisie is rising. We must fool the democracy by lending new colours to the clown's costume which the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik 'leaders of the revolutionary democracy,' our dear friends the Tseretellis and Chernovs, have been wearing since May 19 (6), 1917,² in order to fool the people. We can easily dangle the carrot of a 'Pre-parliament' before their eyes."

"We are strong now," the tsar said to his feudal landlords in June 1907. "The tide of the workers' and peasants' revolution is receding. But we cannot maintain our power in the old way; deception is not enough. A new policy is needed in the countryside, a new economic and political bloc is needed with the Guchkovs and Milyukovs, with the bourgeoisie."

The three situations—August 1905, September 1917, and June 1907—may be presented thus in order the more clearly to demonstrate the objective foundations of the tactics of boycott and their connection with the interrelation of classes. The oppressed classes are always being deceived by the oppressors, but the purpose of the deception is different at different historical moments. Tactics cannot be based merely on the fact that the oppressors deceive the people; tactics must be determined by an analysis of the interrelation of classes as a whole and of the development of the struggle both inside and outside parliament.

¹ Tit Titych—a merchant ridiculed in one of Ostrovsky's comedies.—Ed. Eng. ed.

² The date of formation of the first coalition government, in which the Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries participated.—Ed.

Participation in the Pre-parliament is mistaken tactics; it does not correspond with the objective relation of classes and with the objective situation of the moment.

We should have boycotted the Democratic Conference; we all made a mistake in not doing so. But a mistake is not conscious deceit. We shall correct the mistake, provided there is a sincere desire to support the revolutionary struggle of the masses, provided we earnestly reflect on the objective foundations of our tactics.

We must boycott the Pre-parliament. We must turn to the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies, to the trade unions, to the masses in general. We must call upon them to fight. It is to them we must issue the correct and definite slogan: Disperse Kerensky's Bonapartist gang and his spurious Pre-parliament, this Tseretelli-Bulygin Duma. The Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries, even after the Kornilov affair, refused to accept our compromise proposing a peaceful transfer of power to the Soviets (in which at that time we had not yet a majority). They have again sunk into a morass of filthy and mean bargains with the Cadets. Down with the Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries! Fight them mercilessly! Ruthlessly expel them from all revolutionary organisations! No negotiations and no communication with these friends of the Kishkins, these friends of the Kornilovist landlords and capitalists!

Saturday, October 6 (September 23)

* * *

Trotsky was for the boycott. Bravo, Comrade Trotsky!

In the fraction of Bolsheviks assembled for the Democratic Conference boycottism has been defeated.

Long live the boycott!

We cannot and must not under any circumstances reconcile ourselves to participation. A fraction of one of the Conferences is not the highest body in the Party. Ay, and even the decisions of the highest bodies are subject to revision in accordance with actual experience.

We must at all costs strive to secure a decision in favour of boycott at the Plenum of the Central Executive Committee and at an extraordinary congress of the Party. We must make the question of boycott the platform for the elections to the congress and for all elections within the Party. The masses must be drawn into the discussion of this question. The class conscious workers must be got to take the matter into their hands, to conduct the discussion and bring pressure to bear upon the leaders.

There is not the slightest doubt of the vacillation among the leaders of our Party, vacillation which may become fatal; for the struggle is developing, and, under certain conditions, at a certain moment, vacillation may be fatal to the cause. We must mobilise all our forces in the struggle before it is too late; we must insist that the party of the revolutionary proletariat conduct a correct line.

Not all is well among the "parliamentary" leaders of our Party; more attention must be paid to them, more vigilance must be exercised over them by the workers; the sphere of competence of parliamentary fractions must be more rigidly defined.

The mistake committed by our Party is obvious. The fighting party of the advanced class is not afraid of mistakes. The danger is when one persists in one's mistake, when false pride prevents recognition of one's mistake and its correction.

Sunday, October 7 (September 24)

* * *

The Congress of Soviets has been postponed until November 2 (October 20). At the pace at which Russia is now living, this is almost equivalent to postponing it to the Greek Kalends. The comedy staged by the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks after May 3-4 (April 20-21) is being repeated.

October 5-7 (September 22-24), 1917

THE AIMS OF THE REVOLUTION *

RUSSIA is a petty-bourgeois country. The vast majority of the population belongs to this class. Its vacillation between the bourgeoisie and the proletariat is inevitable. Only when it joins the proletariat will the victory of the cause of the revolution, of the cause of peace, freedom and land for the toilers, be secured—easily, peacefully, swiftly and smoothly.

The course of our revolution reveals this vacillation in practice. Let us then not harbour any illusions concerning the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik parties; let us keep firmly to our class proletarian path. The poverty of the poor peasants, the horrors of the war, the horrors of the famine—all these are bringing home more and more clearly to the masses the correctness of the proletarian path, the necessity of supporting the proletarian revolution.

The “peaceful” petty-bourgeois hopes in a “coalition” with the bourgeoisie, in compromises with the bourgeoisie, in the possibility of “calmly” waiting for an “early” convocation of the Constituent Assembly and so forth—these hopes are being mercilessly, cruelly and implacably dashed to the ground by the course of the revolution. The Kornilov affair was the last cruel lesson, a great lesson, a lesson which supplemented thousands and thousands of small lessons of deception practised on the workers and peasants by the local capitalists and landlords, of deception practised on the soldiers by the officers, and so on and so forth.

Discontent, indignation and bitterness are spreading in the army and among the peasants and workers. The “coalition” of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks with the bourgeoisie, which promises everything and does nothing, is irritating the masses, opening their eyes to the truth and driving them to revolt.

The opposition of the “Lefts” is growing among the Socialist-

Revolutionaries (Spiridonova and others) and among the Mensheviks (Martov and others), and already embraces 40 per cent of the "Council" and "Congress" of these parties,* while below, among the proletariat and the peasantry, particularly the poor peasantry, the majority of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks are "Lefts."

The Kornilov affair is instructive. The Kornilov affair has proved very instructive.

One does not know whether the Soviets can now go farther than the leaders of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks, and thus secure a peaceful development of the revolution, or whether they will continue to mark time, and thus render a proletarian uprising inevitable.

That one does not know.

It is our business to help in every possible way to secure a "last" chance for a peaceful development of the revolution. We can help to bring this about by expounding our programme, by explaining its general national character and its absolute harmony with the interests and demands of the enormous majority of the population.

The following lines are an attempt at such an exposition of our programme.

Let us take this programme to the rank and file, to the masses, to the office employees, to the workers, to the peasants, not only to our own, but particularly to those who follow the Socialist-Revolutionaries, to the non-party elements, to the unenlightened. Let us endeavour to inspire them to form their independent judgment, to make their own decisions, to send their own delegations to the Conference, to the Soviets, to the government. Then our work will not have been in vain, no matter what the outcome of the Conference may be. It will prove useful for the Conference, for the elections to the Constituent Assembly, and for every political activity generally.

Events are proving that the Bolshevik programme and tactics are correct. From May 3 (April 20) to the Kornilov affair—what a crowded span!

Experience during that span taught the masses, the oppressed classes, a great deal; the leaders of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks have completely parted ways with the masses. This will be revealed best of all by a concrete programme, if we succeed in securing its discussion among the masses.

THE FATAL DANGER OF COMPROMISE WITH THE CAPITALISTS

1) To leave even a few representatives of the bourgeoisie in the government, to leave such notorious Kornilovists in power as Generals Alexeyev, Klembovsky, Bagratyon and Gagarin, or such as have proved their utter impotence when confronted by the bourgeoisie and their penchant for Bonapartist action, like Kerensky, is to throw the door wide open to famine and inevitable economic catastrophe, which the capitalists are intentionally accelerating and intensifying, and to a military catastrophe; for the army hates the general staff and has no enthusiasm for the imperialist war. Moreover, if the Kornilovist generals and officers remain in power they will, undoubtedly, deliberately open the front to the Germans, as they did in the case of Galicia and Riga.* Only by the formation of a new government on a new basis, as explained below, can this be prevented. After all we have gone through since May 3 (April 20), were the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks to continue any kind of compromise with the bourgeoisie it would be not so much a mistake as a direct betrayal of the people and the revolution.

POWER TO THE SOVIETS

2) The entire power of the state must pass exclusively to the representatives of the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies, acting in accordance with a definite programme, and the government must be fully answerable to the Soviets. New elections to the Soviets must be held immediately, both in order to register the experiences gained by the people during the recent weeks of revolution, which have been so rich in events, and in order to eliminate crying injustices that have in places remained uncorrected (non-proportional and unequal elections, etc.).

In the localities, where democratically elected institutions still do not exist, and in the army, the power must be transferred exclusively to the local Soviets and to commissars elected by them, and to other exclusively elective institutions.

The arming of the workers and of the revolutionary troops, i.e., those who have in practice proved their ability to suppress the Kornilovists, must be effected unconditionally and universally with the full support of the state.

PEACE TO THE NATIONS

3) The Soviet government must immediately make proposals to all the belligerent nations (i.e., simultaneously both to their governments and to the masses of workers and peasants) for the conclusion without delay of a general peace on democratic conditions, and an immediate armistice (at least for three months).

The chief condition for a democratic peace is the renunciation of annexations—not in the mistaken sense that all the powers are to receive back what they have lost, but in the only correct sense that every nationality, without a single exception, both in Europe and in the colonies, shall obtain the freedom and the possibility of deciding for itself whether it shall become a separate state or whether it shall form part of another state.

Proposing these conditions of peace, the Soviet government must itself immediately proceed to put them into effect, i.e., it must publish and repudiate the secret treaties by which we are still bound, treaties which were concluded by the tsar and which promise the Russian capitalists the pillage of Turkey, Austria, etc. Then, it is our duty immediately to satisfy the demands of the Ukrainians and the Finns. We must guarantee them, as well as all the other non-Russian nationalities in Russia, full freedom, including freedom of secession. The same must apply to the whole of Armenia; we must undertake to evacuate it, as well as the Turkish lands occupied by us, and so forth.

Such conditions of peace will not be favourably received by the capitalists; but they will be received by all the peoples with such tremendous sympathy, they will cause such a great, world-historic outburst of enthusiasm and such general indignation against the dragging out of this predatory war, that it is most probable that we shall at once obtain an armistice and consent to the commencement of peace negotiations. For the workers' revolution against the war is irresistibly growing everywhere; and it can be advanced not by talk of peace (with which the workers and peasants have so long been deceived by all the imperialist governments, including our own, the Kerensky government) but by breaking with the capitalists and making proposals for peace.

If the most improbable eventuates, viz., if not a single belligerent state consents even to an armistice, then, as far as we are concerned, the war will really become a war forced upon us, a really just and defensive war. The mere recognition of this fact by the proletariat and the poor peasantry will render Russia many times stronger even from the military point of view, especially after we have completely broken with the capitalists, who are robbing the people; not to mention the fact that under such conditions the war on our part will in actual fact be a war in alliance with the oppressed classes of all countries, a war in alliance with the oppressed nations of the whole world.

In particular, the people must be cautioned against the assertion of the capitalists, which sometimes influences the more timorous and the philistines, that in the event of a rupture of the present predatory alliance with the British and other capitalists the latter are capable of doing serious damage to the Russian revolution. That assertion is utterly false, for the "financial aid of the Allies," while enriching the bankers, "supports" the Russian workers and peasants as the rope supports the hanged man. There is plenty of bread, coal, oil and iron in Russia; it is only necessary to get rid of the landlords and the capitalists who are robbing the people in order to secure a proper distribution of these products. As to the danger of a war against the Russian people on the part of their present Allies, the assumption that the French and Italians are capable of combining their armies with the Germans in order to attack Russia, when she has proposed a just peace, is utterly absurd. And as for England, America, and Japan, even were they to declare war on Russia (which would be extremely difficult for them, both in view of the unpopularity of such a war among the masses and in view of the divergence of the material interests of the capitalists of those countries as to the partition of Asia, and particularly as to the plundering of China), they could not cause Russia a hundredth part of the damage and misery which the war with Germany, Austria, and Turkey entails.

THE LAND TO THE TOILERS

4) The Soviet government must immediately proclaim the abolition of private property in the landed estates without compensation, and place these lands under the control of peasant committees, pending the decision of the Constituent Assembly. These peasant committees shall also be entrusted with the control of the farm property of the landed estates, which shall unconditionally be placed principally at the disposal of the poor peasants free of charge.

These measures, which have long been demanded by the vast majority of the peasants, both in resolutions of their congresses and in hundreds of instructions from local peasants' assemblies (as may be seen, for instance, from the summary of 242 Instructions published in the Izvestiya of the Soviet of Peasants' Deputies),¹ are absolutely essential and urgent. Procrastination, from which the peasantry suffered so much during the "coalition" government, cannot further be tolerated.

Any government that delayed in putting these measures into effect would have to be recognised as a government hostile to the people and deserving of being overthrown and crushed by the revolt of the workers and peasants. Conversely, only a government that carries these measures into effect will be a government of the people.

MEASURES AGAINST FAMINE AND ECONOMIC RUIN

5) The Soviet government must immediately introduce throughout the state workers' control over production and consumption. As has been shown by the experience of May 19 (6), failing such control all promises of reform and all attempts at reform are futile, and famine and catastrophe of unprecedented dimensions threaten the country from week to week.

¹ See note to p. 380.*—Ed.

The immediate nationalisation of the banks and the insurance business is essential, as well as of the more important branches of industry (oil, coal, metal, sugar, etc.). This must be accompanied by the abolition of commercial secrets and the establishment of unrelaxing vigilance by the workers and peasants over that insignificant minority, the capitalists, who wax rich on government contracts and who evade furnishing returns of and paying fair taxes on their profits and properties.

These measures, which will not deprive the middle peasants, or the Cossacks, or the small artisans, of a single kopek of their property, are absolutely fair from the point of view of the equitable distribution of the burden of the war and are absolutely urgent as measures against famine. Only by curbing the marauding tendencies of the capitalists and by putting a stop to their deliberate interruption of production will it be possible to increase the productivity of labour, establish universal labour service, regulate the exchange of grain for industrial products, and secure the return to the treasury of many billions of paper money now hoarded by the wealthy.

Unless these measures are taken, the abolition of private property in the landed estates without compensation will also be impossible, for the landed estates are for the most part mortgaged to the banks, and the interests of the landlords and capitalists are inseparably interwoven.

The recent resolution of the Economic Section of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee of the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies (Rabochaya Gazeta, No. 152) records not only the "balefulness" of the government's measures (such as the raising of the price of grain with the purpose of enriching the landlords and kulaks), not only "the fact of the complete passivity of the central bodies created by the government for the regulation of economic life," but also the "violation of the law" by that government. Such an admission on the part of the ruling parties, the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks, is one more proof of the criminal nature of the policy of compromise with the bourgeoisie.

MEASURES AGAINST THE COUNTER-REVOLUTION OF THE LANDLORDS AND CAPITALISTS

6) The uprising of Kornilov and Kaledin¹ was supported by the entire landlord and capitalist class, headed by the party of the Cadets (the "People's Freedom" Party). This has been fully proved by the facts published in the Izvestiya of the Central Executive Committee.

But nothing has been done to completely suppress this counter-revolution, or even to investigate it, and, indeed, nothing of any value can be done unless the power passes to the Soviets. No commission is capable of instituting a full investigation, of arresting the guilty, etc., unless it is endowed with government powers. This can and must be undertaken by a Soviet government alone. Only such a government, by arresting the Kornilovist generals and the leaders of the bourgeois counter-revolution (Guchkov, Milyukov, Ryabushinsky, Maklakov, etc.), by disbanding the counter-revolutionary organisations (the State Duma, the officers' leagues, etc.), by placing their members under the surveillance of the local Soviets, and by disbanding the counter-revolutionary regiments, can make Russia secure against an inevitable repetition of "Kornilov" attempts.

Such a government alone can set up a commission for the purpose of a complete and public investigation of the Kornilovist case, as well as of all other cases, even those against which action has already been started by the bourgeoisie; and only to such a commission would the Party of the Bolsheviks, in its turn, call upon the workers to give full obedience and co-operation.

Only a Soviet government can successfully combat such a flagrant injustice as the seizure by the capitalists, with the aid of the millions filched from the people, of the largest printing plants and the majority of the papers. The bourgeois counter-revolutionary papers (Rech, Russkoye Slovo, etc.) must be suppressed and their printing plants confiscated, private advertisements in the papers must be declared a state monopoly and transferred to the government paper published by the Soviets, which tells the peasants the truth. Only in this way can, and must, this powerful medium of unpunished lies and slander, serving to deceive the people, mislead the peasantry, and prepare for counter-revolution, be wrested from the hands of the bourgeoisie.

¹ See note to p. 205.*—Ed.

PEACEFUL DEVELOPMENT OF THE REVOLUTION

7) The democracy of Russia, the Soviets and the Socialist-Revolutionary and the Menshevik parties, are now confronted with the opportunity, very seldom to be met with in the history of revolution, of securing the convocation of the Constituent Assembly at the appointed date without further delay, of saving the country from military and economic catastrophe, and of securing a peaceful development of the revolution.

If the Soviets now take the full and exclusive power of the state into their own hands, with the purpose of carrying out the programme set forth above, they will not only be guaranteed the support of nine-tenths of the population of Russia—the working class and the vast majority of the peasantry—but will also be guaranteed the great revolutionary enthusiasm of the army and the majority of the people, without which victory over famine and war is impossible.

There could be no question of resistance being offered to the Soviets now if they did not themselves vacillate. No class would dare to raise a rebellion against the Soviets, and the landlords and capitalists, chastened by the experience of the Kornilov affair, would peacefully surrender their power upon the ultimatum of the Soviets. In order to overcome the resistance of the capitalists to the programme of the Soviets, it would be sufficient to establish supervision by the workers and peasants over the exploiters and to punish recalcitrants by such measures as the confiscation of their entire property, coupled with a short term of imprisonment.

By seizing power now—and this is probably their last chance—the Soviets could still secure a peaceful development of the revolution, the peaceful election of deputies by the people, the peaceful struggle of parties within the Soviets, the testing of the programmes of the various parties in practice, and the peaceful transfer of power from party to party.

If this opportunity is allowed to pass, the entire course of development of the revolution, from the movement of May 3 (April 20) to the Kornilov affair, points to the inevitability of a bitter civil war between the bourgeoisie and the proletariat. Inevitable catastrophe will bring this war nearer. To judge by all the signs and considerations comprehensible to the human mind, this war is bound to terminate in the complete victory of the working class and its support by the poor peasantry in carrying out the programme set forth above. The war may prove arduous and bloody and cost the lives of tens of thousands of landlords and capitalists, and of army officers who sympathise with them. The proletariat will stop at no sacrifice in order to save the revolution, which is impossible apart from the programme set forth above. On the other hand, the proletariat would support the Soviets in every way if they were to avail themselves of their last chance of securing a peaceful development of the revolution.

October 9-10 (September 26-27), 1917

CAN THE BOLSHEVIKS RETAIN STATE POWER? *

ON what are all currents agreed, from Rech to Novaya Zhizn, from the Cadet-Kornilovists to the semi-Bolsheviks, everybody except the Bolsheviks?

They are all agreed that the Bolsheviks alone will either never dare to take over the entire power of the state, or, if they do dare, that they will not be able to retain it even for the shortest space of time.

In case it is asserted that the assumption of the entire power of the state by the Bolsheviks alone is a question possessing not the slightest political actuality, and that only the gross conceit of a "fanatic" could regard it as being actual, we shall refute such an assertion by quoting the exact declarations of very responsible and influential political parties and tendencies of various "hues."

But first a word or two regarding the first of the questions mentioned: Will the Bolsheviks dare alone to take over the entire power of the state? I have already had occasion to reply to this question by a categorical affirmative at the All-Russian Congress of Soviets, in a remark I felt compelled to shout from my seat during one of Tseretelli's ministerial speeches. Nor have I met with any declaration by the Bolsheviks, either printed or oral, to the effect that we should not alone assume power. I continue to maintain that any political party generally, and the party of the advanced class in particular, would forfeit its right to exist, would be unworthy of being regarded as a party, would be a wretched cipher in every sense, were it to refuse to assume power when it had the opportunity to do so.

Let us now proceed to quote statements of Cadets, Socialist-Revolutionaries and semi-Bolsheviks (I would rather say quarter-Bolsheviks) on the question under discussion.

The following is from an editorial in Rech of September 29 (16):

"... Discord and confusion reigned in the hall of the Alexandrinsky Theatre;¹ and the Socialist press reflects the same picture. The views of the Bolsheviks alone were distinguished by definiteness and directness. At the Conference these are the views of the minority. In the Soviets they represent a current which is steadily gaining in strength. But in spite of their rhetorical truculence, their boastful phrases and their demonstrative self-confidence, the Bolsheviks, with the exception of a few fanatics, are brave only in words. They would not attempt to take over the 'entire power' of their own accord. Disorganisers and disrupters par excellence, they are essentially cowards; in their heart of hearts they fully realise their own ignorance and the ephemeral nature of their present successes. They know as well as we do that the first day of their final triumph would also be the first day of their headlong fall. Irresponsible by their very nature, anarchists in method and practice, they are conceivable only as one of the currents of political thought, or, more correctly, as one of its aberrations. The best way to get rid of Bolshevism for many years, to eliminate it, would be to entrust its leaders with the fate of the country. And were it not for the consciousness of the inadmissible and disastrous nature of such experiments, one might, in desperation, decide even upon such a heroic measure. Happily, we repeat, these wretched heroes of the day are themselves not really anxious to seize the entire power. Under no circumstances are they capable of constructive work. Thus all their definiteness and directness are limited to the political platform, to meeting oratory. For all practical purposes, their position cannot be taken seriously from any point of view. However, in one respect it has a certain practical consequence: it unites all other shades of 'Socialist thought' in a negative attitude towards it. . . ."

This is how the Cadets argue. And here is the point of view of the largest, the "ruling and governing" party in Russia, the "Socialist-Revolutionaries," as expressed in an also unsigned, and therefore editorial, article in their official organ, Dyelo Naroda, of October 4 (September 21):

"... Should the bourgeoisie, pending the convocation of the Constituent Assembly, be unwilling to work together with the democracy on the basis of the platform adopted by the Conference, then the coalition must arise from within the Conference itself. That would be a great sacrifice on the part of the supporters of a coalition, but even the propagandists of a 'clear line' of power must agree to this. We are afraid, however, that no agreement may be reached. In that case a third and last combination remains, namely, that the section of the Conference must organise the government that stood on principle for homogeneity of government.

"We will put it bluntly: The Bolsheviks will be obliged to form a cabinet.

¹ I.e., during the Democratic Conference, which met in the Alexandrinsky Theatre in Petrograd in September 1917.—Ed.

They displayed the greatest energy in inculcating a hatred of coalition into the revolutionary democracy, promising every benefit as soon as 'compromise' was abandoned, and attributing to the latter all the misfortunes of the country.

"If in their agitational work they really meant what they said, if they were not deceiving the masses, they are in duty bound to pay the promissory notes they handed out right and left.

"The question is clear.

"Let them not make futile attempts to take refuge in hastily concocted theories as to the impossibility of their assuming power.

"The democracy will accept no such theories.

"At the same time, the advocates of coalition must guarantee them full support. Such are the three combinations, the three ways open to us—there are no others." (The italics are by Dyelo Naroda.)

Thus argue the Socialist-Revolutionaries. And here, finally, is the position—if an attempt to sit between two stools can be called a position—of the Novaya Zhizn-ist quarter-Bolsheviks,* as expressed in an editorial in Novaya Zhizn of October 6 (September 23):

"... Should a coalition with Konovalov and Kishkin again take shape, it will simply involve a new capitulation on the part of the democracy and the rejection of the resolution of the Conference regarding the formation of a responsible government on the basis of the platform of August 27 (14).

"A homogeneous ministry of Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries will feel its responsibility as little as it was felt by the responsible Socialist ministers in the Coalition Cabinet. . . . Such a government would not only be incapable of rallying to itself the 'vital forces' of the revolution, but could not even count on any active support from the vanguard of the proletariat.

"However, the formation of another type of homogeneous cabinet, a government of the 'proletariat and the poor peasantry,' would be not a better, but a much worse escape from the situation—in fact, it would not be an escape at all; it would be a simple failure. Such a slogan, it is true, is not being advanced by anyone except in occasional, timid, and subsequently systematically 'explained-away' remarks of Rabochy Put. [This glaring untruth is "boldly" written by responsible publicists, who have even forgotten the editorial of Dyelo Naroda of October 4.]

"Formally, the Bolsheviks have now revived the slogan, 'All Power to the Soviets.' This slogan was dropped when, after the July days, the Soviets through the Central Executive Committee definitely began to pursue an active anti-Bolshevik policy. Now, however, not only may the 'Soviet line' be considered straightened out, but there is every reason to assume that the proposed Congress of Soviets will yield a Bolshevik majority. Under such circumstances, the slogan, 'All Power to the Soviets,' revived by the Bolsheviks, is a 'tactical line' aiming at the dictatorship of the proletariat and the 'poor peasantry.' True, by Soviets are also implied the Soviets of Peasants' Deputies, and thus the Bolshevik slogan implies a power resting on the overwhelming majority of the whole democracy of Russia. But in that case the slogan, 'All Power to the Soviets,' loses all independent significance, since the Soviets are thus made almost identical in their composition with the 'Pre-parliament' formed by the Conference. . . ."

(This assertion of Novaya Zhizn is a shameless lie, and is equivalent to declaring that spurious and sham democracy is "almost identical" with democracy. The Pre-parliament is a fraud, which pretends that the will of a minority of the people—particularly of Kuskova, Berkenheim, Chaikovsky and Co.*—is the will of the majority. That, in the first place. In the second place, even the Peasants' Soviets, faked by the Avksentyevs and Chaikovskys, yielded at the Conference such a high percentage of opponents to the coalition that they, together with the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, would inevitably have brought about the collapse of the coalition. And, in the third place, "Power to the Soviets" means that the power of the Peasants' Soviets would principally embrace the villages, and in the villages a majority of the poor peasantry is assured. . . .)

"If it is one and the same thing, then the Bolshevik slogan must be immediately withdrawn. If, however, 'Power to the Soviets' is only a disguise for the dictatorship of the proletariat, then such a power would imply the collapse and failure of the revolution.

"Is it necessary to prove that the proletariat, isolated not only from the other classes of the country, but also from the truly vital forces of democracy, will be unable either technically to take control of the state apparatus and to set it in motion under the exceptionally complicated existing circumstances, or politically to resist the pressure of hostile forces, which will sweep away not only the dictatorship of the proletariat, but the whole revolution as well?

"The only power answering the requirements of the moment would be a truly honest coalition within the democracy itself. . . ."

* * *

We apologise to the reader for the long quotations, but they were absolutely necessary. One had to give an exact idea of the position of the various parties hostile to the Bolsheviks. One had definitely to prove the highly important circumstance that all these parties have admitted that the question of the assumption of the entire power of the state by the Bolsheviks alone is not only feasible but is an actual question, a burning question.

Let us now examine the grounds on which "everybody," from the Cadets to the Novaya Zhizn-ists, is convinced that the Bolsheviks will not be able to retain power.

The sedate Rech offers no arguments at all. It merely pours upon the Bolsheviks streams of the choicest and most irate abuse. The quotation cited by us incidentally shows how wrong it would be to think that Rech is "provoking" the Bolsheviks to assume power and that, therefore, "Beware, comrades, what the enemy advises must certainly be bad!" If, instead of realistically weighing the general and particular pros and cons, we allow ourselves to be "persuaded" that the bourgeoisie is "provoking" us to take power, we shall find that we have been fooled by the bourgeoisie. For there is not the slightest doubt that the bourgeoisie, in its malice, will always prophesy a million misfortunes that will follow the assumption of power by the Bolsheviks; it will always cry in fury: "Better get rid of the Bolsheviks at once and for 'many years' to come by allowing them to take power and then routing them." If you like, such cries are also "provocation," only from an opposite angle. The Cadets and the bourgeoisie do not "advise" and have never "advised" us to take power; they are only trying to frighten us by what they call unsolvable problems of government.

No, we must not allow ourselves to be scared by the outcries of the scared bourgeoisie. We must remember that we have never set ourselves the aim of solving "unsolvable" social problems; and as for the perfectly solvable problems of the immediate steps towards socialism, as the only escape from an extremely difficult situation, they can be solved only by a dictatorship of the proletariat and the poor peasantry. More than at any other time, more than anywhere else, the proletariat in Russia, if it now seizes power, can be certain of victory, and of a lasting victory.

Let us discuss in a purely businesslike manner the concrete circumstances which render this or that particular moment unfavourable, but let us not allow ourselves to be scared for a moment by the wild cries of the bourgeoisie, and let us not forget that the assumption of the entire power by the Bolsheviks is becoming a truly urgent question. The danger to our Party will be immeasurably greater if we forget this than if we concede that the assumption of power is "premature." "Premature" it cannot be now; the chances are a million to one, or perhaps a million to two, in favour of this.

As to the irate abuse of Rech, we might say:

*We hear the voice of approbation
Not in the dulcet sounds of praise,
But in the roar of irritation!*¹

The fact that the bourgeoisie so savagely detests us is a convincing proof that we are showing the people the right way and the right means to overthrow the rule of the bourgeoisie.

* * *

On this occasion Dyelo Naroda, by way of a rare exception, did not think fit to honour us with its abuse, but neither did it advance a shadow of argument. It only endeavoured indirectly, in the form of a hint, to scare us by the prospect that "the Bolsheviks will be obliged to form a cabinet." I am fully ready to admit that, in trying to scare us, the Socialist-Revolutionaries are sincerely scared themselves—scared to death by the phantom conjured up by a scared liberal mind. I can equally admit that in certain very august, and very rotten, institutions, such as the Central Executive Committee, and similar "contact" commissions (i.e., that maintain contact with the Cadets, or, more bluntly, hobnob with the Cadets), the Socialist-Revolutionaries do succeed in frightening some of the Bolsheviks. For, first, the atmosphere in these Central Executive Committees, Pre-parliaments, and the like, is abominable, putrid to the point of nausea, and to breathe it for any length of time is injurious to any man; and, secondly, sincerity is contagious, and a sincerely scared philistine is capable of temporarily transforming even a revolutionary into a philistine.

But however understandable, "humanly" speaking, may be the sincere fright of a Socialist-Revolutionary who has the misfortune to be a minister in a government with the Cadets, or to be eligible for a ministerial position in the eyes of the Cadets, for us to allow ourselves to be scared would be a political error which may easily border on treachery to the proletariat. Let us have businesslike arguments, gentlemen! And do not hope that we shall allow ourselves to be scared by your own fright!

¹ From Nekrasov's poem, "The Death of Gogol."—Ed.

* * *

Arguments to the point are to be found this time only in Novaya Zhizn. On this occasion it appears as the advocate of the bourgeoisie, a role that suits it much better than the role of defender of the Bolsheviks, which obviously shocks this "amiable lady."

This advocate advanced six arguments:

- 1) The proletariat is "isolated from the other classes of the country."
- 2) It is "isolated from the truly vital forces of democracy."
- 3) It "will be unable technically to take control of the state apparatus."
- 4) It "will be unable to set this apparatus in motion."
- 5) "The circumstances are exceptionally complicated."
- 6) It "will be unable to resist the pressure of hostile forces, which will sweep away not only the dictatorship of the proletariat, but the whole revolution."

The first argument is formulated by Novaya Zhizn so clumsily as to be positively ridiculous, for we know but three classes in capitalist and semi-capitalist society: the bourgeoisie, the petty bourgeoisie (with the peasantry as its chief representative), and the proletariat. What, then, is the sense of saying that the proletariat is isolated from the other classes, when the issue is a struggle of the proletariat against the bourgeoisie, of a revolution against the bourgeoisie?

Novaya Zhizn must have meant that the proletariat is isolated from the peasantry, for surely it could not have meant the landlords. But it dared not say definitely and clearly that the proletariat is now isolated from the peasantry, for the glaring untruth of such a statement would be only too evident.

It is difficult to conceive that in a capitalist country the proletariat could be so little isolated from the petty bourgeoisie—and, mind you, in a revolution against the bourgeoisie—as the proletariat now is in Russia. As objective and indisputable proof, we have the figures of the voting for and against a coalition with the bourgeoisie of the various "curiæ" of Tseretelli's "Bulygin Duma," i.e., the notorious "Democratic" Conference.

Taking the Soviet curiæ, we find:

	For coalition	Against coalition
Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies	83	192
Soviets of Peasants' Deputies	102	70
All Soviets	185	262

Thus, the majority is on the side of the proletarian slogan "We are opposed to a coalition with the bourgeoisie." As we saw above, even the Cadets are forced to admit the growing influence of the Bolsheviks in the Soviets. And here we have a Conference summoned by the recent leaders in the Soviets, by the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks, who have an assured majority in the central institutions! It is clear that the actual superiority of the Bolsheviks in the Soviets is here minimised.

Both on the question of a coalition with the bourgeoisie and on the question of the immediate handing over of the landed estates to the peasant committees, the Bolsheviks already have a majority in the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies—a majority of the people, a majority of the petty bourgeoisie. Rabochy Put of No. 19, October 7 (September 24), cites from No. 25 of the organ of the Socialist-Revolutionaries, Znamya Truda,* an account of a conference of local Soviets of Peasants' Deputies held in Petrograd on October 1 (September 18). At this conference, the Executive Committees of four Peasants' Soviets (of the Kostroma, Moscow, Samara and Taurida gubernias¹) expressed themselves in favour of an unrestricted coalition. The Executive Committees of three gubernias (the Vladimir, Ryazan and the Black Sea gubernias) and two armies were in favour of coalition without the Cadets. The Executive Committees of twenty-three gubernias and four armies declared themselves against coalition.

Thus, the majority of the peasants are against coalition!

So much for the "isolation of the proletariat."

It should be noted, by the way, that in favour of coalition

¹ Gubernia—a province.—Ed. Eng. ed.

were three outlying gubernias, Samara, Taurida and Black Sea, where there are a comparatively large number of rich peasants and big landlords employing hired labour, and also four industrial gubernias (Vladimir, Ryazan, Kostroma and Moscow), where the peasant bourgeoisie is also stronger than in the majority of the Russian gubernias. It would be interesting to gather more detailed figures on this subject and to ascertain whether information is not available regarding the poor peasants in the gubernias containing the "richest" peasantry.

Further, it is interesting to note that the "national groups" revealed a considerable predominance of opponents of coalition, namely, forty votes as against fifteen. The annexationist and harshly oppressive policy of the Bonapartist Kerensky and Co. towards the non-sovereign nations of Russia has borne fruit. The broad mass of the population of the oppressed nations, i.e., the mass of their petty bourgeoisie, trust the proletariat of Russia more than they do the bourgeoisie, for history has placed on the order of the day the struggle for emancipation of the oppressed nations against their oppressors. The bourgeoisie has basely betrayed the cause of freedom of the oppressed nations; the proletariat has remained loyal to the cause of freedom.

The national and agrarian questions are questions of fundamental importance for the petty-bourgeois masses of the population of Russia at the present time. That is indisputable. And with regard to both these questions the proletariat is a long way from being "isolated." It has the majority of the people behind it. It alone is capable of pursuing a bold and truly "revolutionary-democratic" policy on both these questions, such as would immediately assure a proletarian government not only the support of the majority of the population, but also a veritable outburst of revolutionary enthusiasm on the part of the masses. For at the hands of that government the masses would for the first time meet not with the ruthless oppression of the peasants by the landlords, of the Ukrainians by the Great-Russians, as was the case under tsarism; they would meet not with an attempt, camouflaged by fine phrases, to pursue a similar policy under the republic; they would meet not with blame, insult, chicanery, procrastination, shabby treatment and evasion (with all of which Kerensky rewards the peasants and the oppressed nations), but with warm sympathy, demonstrated in practice, by immediate and revolutionary measures directed against the landlords, and by the immediate restoration of full freedom for Finland, the Ukraine, White Russia, the Mussulmans, etc.

Messieurs the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks know this very well, and that is why they drag in the semi-Cadet leaders of the co-operatives to assist them in their reactionary-democratic policy directed against the masses. That is why they will never dare to consult the opinion of the masses, to institute a referendum, or even take a vote of all the local Soviets and of all local organisations on definite points of practical policy, for instance, whether the landed estates should be handed over immediately to the peasant committees, whether such-and-such demands of the Finns and the Ukrainians should be conceded, and so forth.

And as to the question of peace, that cardinal question of present-day life. The proletariat is "isolated from the other classes. . . ." Truly, the proletariat here comes forth as the representative of the whole nation, of all that is vital and honest in all classes, of the vast majority of the petty bourgeoisie; for only the proletariat, having attained power, will at once propose a just peace to all belligerent nations; only the proletariat will undertake truly revolutionary measures (the publication of the secret treaties, etc.) in order to secure at the earliest possible date as just a peace as possible.

No, when the gentlemen of Novaya Zhizn howl that the proletariat is isolated they are only expressing the subjective fear induced in them by the bourgeoisie. In the objective state of affairs in Russia at the present time the proletariat is most certainly not "isolated" from the majority of the petty bourgeoisie. Now, after the unhappy experience of the "coalition," the proletariat has the sympathy of the majority of the people on its side. This condition for the retention of power by the Bolsheviks does exist.

* * *

The second argument consists in the assertion that the proletariat is "isolated from the truly vital forces of democracy." What this means it is impossible to understand. It is probably "Greek," as the French say in such cases.

The writers of Novaya Zhizn would make eligible ministers. They are eminently suited to serve as ministers under the Cadets. For what is required of such ministers is the ability to utter fine-sounding, polished phrases which have absolutely no meaning, but which can cover any dirty business, and which therefore are assured the plaudits of the imperialists and the social-imperialists. The Novaya Zhizn-ists are assured the plaudits of the Cadets, Breshkovskaya, Plekhanov and Co. for their assertion that the proletariat is isolated from the truly vital forces of democracy. For indirectly that means—or will be understood to mean—that the Cadets, Breshkovskaya, Plekhanov, Kerensky and Co. are "the vital forces of democracy."

That is untrue. They are dead forces. The history of the coalition proved that.

Cowed by the bourgeoisie and their bourgeois-intellectual environment, the Novaya Zhizn-ists regard as "vital" the Right Wing of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks,* who do not differ in anything essential from the Cadets, such as Volya Naroda, Yedinstvo, etc. We, on the other hand, regard as "vital" only those who are bound up with the masses and not with the kulaks, only those who have been led by the experience of the coalition to turn away from it. "The active vital forces" of petty-bourgeois democracy are represented by the Left-Wing Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks. The increasing strength of this Left Wing, particularly after the July counter-revolution, is one of the surest objective signs that the proletariat is not isolated.

This became still more evident quite recently in the wavering of the Socialist-Revolutionary Centre  towards the Left, as is shown by Chernov's declaration of October 7 (September 24) to the effect that his group cannot support the new coalition with Kishkin and Co. This shift towards the Left of the Socialist-Revolutionary Centre, which hitherto provided the overwhelming majority of the representatives of the Socialist-Revolutionary Party—the party which, by the number of votes it obtained in the towns and, particularly, in the villages, occupies a supreme and dominating position—proves that the statements quoted by us from Dyelo Naroda to the effect that democracy under certain circumstances must “guarantee full support” to a purely Bolshevik government at least are not empty phrases.

Such facts as the refusal of the Socialist-Revolutionary Centre to support a new coalition with Kishkin, or the predominance of the opponents of coalition among the Menshevik defencists in the provinces (Jordania in the Caucasus, and so on), are objective proof that a certain section of the masses, who are still following the Mensheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionaries, will support a purely Bolshevik government.

The Russian proletariat is now very far from being isolated from the vital forces of democracy.

* * *

The third argument: the proletariat “will be unable technically to take control of the state apparatus.” That is perhaps the most usual and most popular argument. For that reason, and for the reason that it indeed points to one of the most serious and difficult tasks that will confront the victorious proletariat, it deserves the utmost attention. There is no doubt that these tasks are very difficult ones; but if we, who call ourselves Socialists, point out this difficulty with the sole purpose of evading the fulfilment of these tasks, we shall simply be erasing all difference between ourselves and the servitors of the bourgeoisie. The difficulty of the tasks of the proletarian revolution should but stimulate the supporters of the proletariat to a more careful and concrete study of the methods of fulfilling those tasks.

The state apparatus means first of all the standing army, the police and the bureaucracy. By asserting that the proletariat will be unable technically to take control of this apparatus, the writers of Novaya Zhizn reveal their extreme ignorance and their disregard of both the facts of experience and the arguments which have long ago been adduced in Bolshevik literature.

The writers of Novaya Zhizn all consider themselves to be, if not Marxists, at least Socialists who are acquainted with Marxism, and educated. And Marx, on the basis of the experience of the Paris Commune, taught us that the proletariat cannot simply lay hold of the ready-made state machine and wield it for its own purposes; he taught us that the proletariat must smash that machine and replace it by a new one (I deal with this subject in detail in a pamphlet the first part of which is now complete and will shortly appear under the title *The State and Revolution: the Marxist Doctrine of the State and the Tasks of the Proletariat in the Revolution*¹). Such a new state apparatus was created by the Paris Commune, and of this same type of "state apparatus" are the Russian Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies. I have been repeatedly pointing this out ever since April 17 (4), 1917; it is referred to in the resolutions of Bolshevik conferences and in Bolshevik literature. Of course, Novaya Zhizn could have announced its complete disagreement both with Marx and with the Bolsheviks. But for a paper that has so often and so haughtily abused the Bolsheviks for their allegedly frivolous attitude towards difficult problems to evade this subject altogether is simply a confession of its own poverty.

The proletariat cannot "lay hold" of the "state apparatus" and cannot "wield it." But it can smash all that is oppressive, all that is routine and incurably bourgeois in the old state apparatus, and replace it by its own new apparatus. And that apparatus is the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies.

It is simply monstrous that Novaya Zhizn has so completely forgotten about this "state apparatus." By such theoretical arguments the writers of Novaya Zhizn are in fact behaving in the sphere of political theory as the Cadets are behaving in the sphere of political practice. For, indeed, if the proletariat and the revolutionary democracy do not need a new state apparatus, then the Soviets lose their raison d'être, their right to exist, and in that case the Cadet-Kornilovists are right in endeavouring to abolish the Soviets.

This monstrous theoretical error and political blindness on the part of Novaya Zhizn is all the more monstrous since even the Menshevik-Internationalists (with whom Novaya Zhizn formed a bloc at the last elections to the City Duma in Petrograd) have on this question revealed a certain approximation to the position of the Bolsheviks. Thus, in the declaration of the Soviet majority read by Comrade Martov at the Democratic Conference we read:

¹ Lenin, Selected Works, Vol. VII.—Ed.

"... The Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies created in the first days of the revolution by the mighty impulse of the genuine creative spirit of the people form the new tissue of the revolutionary state which has replaced the threadbare tissue of the state of the old regime."

This is expressed a trifle too gaudily; in other words, pretentiousness of language serves to conceal a lack of clarity of political thought. The Soviets have not yet replaced the old "tissue," and that old tissue is not the state of the old regime, but the state both of tsarism and of the bourgeois republic. But, at any rate, Martov here stands head and shoulders above the Novaya Zhizn-ists.

The Soviets are a new state apparatus, which, in the first place, provides an armed force of workers and peasants; and this force is not divorced from the people, as was the old standing army, but is fused with the people in the closest possible fashion. From a military point of view, this force is incomparably more powerful than previous forces; from the point of view of the revolution it cannot be replaced by anything else. Secondly, this apparatus provides a bond with the masses, with the majority of the people, so intimate, so indissoluble, so readily controllable and renewable, that there was nothing remotely like it in the previous state apparatus. Thirdly, this apparatus, by virtue of the fact that it is elected and subject to recall at the will of the people without any bureaucratic formalities, is far more democratic than any previous apparatus. Fourthly, it provides a close contact with the most diverse occupations, thus facilitating the adoption of the most varied and most radical reforms without a bureaucracy. Fifthly, it provides a form of organisation of the vanguard, i.e., of the most class conscious, most energetic and most progressive section of the oppressed classes, the workers and peasants, and thus constitutes an apparatus with the help of which the vanguard of the oppressed classes can elevate, educate and lead the gigantic masses of these classes, which hitherto have stood remote from political life and from history. Sixthly, it provides the possibility of combining the advantages of parliamentarism with the advantages of immediate and direct democracy, i.e., of uniting in the persons of the elected representatives of the people both legislative and executive functions. Compared with bourgeois parliamentarism, this represents an advance in the development of democracy which is of historical and world-wide significance.

Our Soviets in 1905 were, so to speak, but an embryo, for they existed for a few weeks only. Under the circumstances of the time there was obviously no possibility of their all-round development. And even now, in the revolution of 1917, that is still not the case, for a period of only a few months is very little, and, what is most important, the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik leaders have prostituted the Soviets, have degraded them to the status of talk-shops, of accessories to the compromising policy of the leaders. The Soviets have been rotting and decaying under the leadership of the Liebers, Dans, Tseretellis and Chernovs. The Soviets can properly develop and expand to their full promise and capacity only provided they assume the entire power of the state; for otherwise they have nothing to do, otherwise they are simply embryos (and an embryo cannot exist very long), or mere puppets. "Dual power" is paralysing the Soviets.

If the creative impulse of the revolutionary classes of the people had not engendered the Soviets, the proletarian revolution in Russia would have been a hopeless cause. For the proletariat could certainly not have retained power with the old state apparatus, while it is impossible to create a new apparatus immediately. The sad history of the prostitution of the Soviets by Tseretelli and Chernov, the history of the "coalition," is at the same time the history of the emancipation of the Soviets from petty-bourgeois illusions, of their passage through the "purgatory" of practical acquaintance with the abomination and filth of all and every bourgeois coalition. Let us hope that this "purgatory" has not injured the Soviets, but rather tempered them.

* * *

The main difficulty of a proletarian revolution is to establish, on a nation-wide scale, a precise and scrupulous system of accounting and control, control by the workers, over the production and distribution of commodities.

When the writers of Novaya Zhizn protested that our slogan of "workers' control" involves syndicalism,* that protest was a specimen of a stupid, schoolboyish application of "Marxism," which, instead of being intelligently digested, is simply learned by rote after the Struve manner. Syndicalism either repudiates the revolutionary dictatorship of the proletariat or relegates it, as it does political power in general, to an utterly subordinate place. We give it prime place. If one speaks in the spirit of the Novaya Zhizn-ists, that is, not of workers' control, but state control—that is a bourgeois-reformist phrase, in essence a purely Cadet formula, for the Cadets have no objection to the participation of the workers in "state" control. The Cadet-Kornilovists know very well that such participation offers the bourgeoisie the best method of deceiving the workers, that it is a most subtle method of bribing, politically, people like Gvozdev, Nikitin, Prokopovich, Tseretelli and the rest of the gang.

When we say "workers' control," always associating that slogan with the dictatorship of the proletariat, and always putting it after the latter, we thereby make plain what state we have in mind. The state is the organ of domination of a class. Of which class? If of the bourgeoisie, then it is a Cadet-Kornilov-Kerensky state, from which the working people of Russia have now been "kornilising and kerensising" for over half a year. If of the proletariat, if it is a proletarian state we are referring to, i.e., the dictatorship of the proletariat, then workers' control can become a national, all-embracing, omnipresent, extremely precise and extremely scrupulous accounting of the production and distribution of goods.

That is the main difficulty, and that is the main problem of the proletarian, i.e., the socialist revolution. Without the Soviets this task, at any rate for Russia, would be impossible of solution. The Soviets indicate the organisational work of the proletariat which can solve this problem of world-historic significance.

We have thus approached another aspect of the question of the state apparatus. Besides the pre-eminent "coercive" machinery—the standing army, the police and the bureaucracy—there is in the modern state an apparatus that is closely connected with the banks and syndicates, an apparatus that performs a vast amount of work of an accounting and statistical nature, if one may so express it. This apparatus must not, and should not, be broken up. It must be wrested from the control of the capitalists; the capitalists must be cut off, lopped away, chopped off from it, together with the threads by which they transmit their influence. It must be subordinated to the proletarian Soviets. It must be made wider, more comprehensive, more popular. And this can be done by taking advantage of the achievements already made by big capitalism (and, indeed, the proletarian revolution generally can attain its aim only by taking advantage of these achievements).

Capitalism has created an apparatus of registration and account in the shape of the banks, syndicates, the postal service, consumers' societies, and unions of employees. Without big banks socialism would be impossible of realisation.

The big banks are the "state apparatus" we need for the realisation of socialism, and which we shall take from capitalism ready-made. Our problem here is only to lop away that which capitalistically disfigures this otherwise excellent apparatus and to make it still bigger, still more democratic, still more comprehensive. Quantity is transformed into quality. A single huge state bank, with branches in every volost¹ and in every factory—that will already be nine-tenths of a socialist apparatus. That will be general state bookkeeping, general state accounting of the production and distribution of goods, something in the nature, so to speak, of the skeleton of a socialist society.

This "state apparatus" (which under capitalism is not wholly a state apparatus, but which will be wholly so with us under socialism) we can "lay hold of" and "wield" at a single stroke, by a single decree; for the actual work of bookkeeping, audit, registration, control and accounting is performed by employees, most of whom are themselves in the position of proletarians or semi-proletarians.

The proletarian government can, and must, by a single decree, transform these employees into state employees—in the same way as the watchdogs of capitalism, such as Briand and other bourgeois ministers, by a single decree transform striking railwaymen into state employees. We shall need a great many more such state employees; and more can be made available, for capitalism has simplified the functions of accounting and audit, and has reduced them to a comparatively simple system of entries, within the capacity of any literate person.

¹ Volost—a rural district.—Ed. Eng. ed.

The transformation of bank, syndicate, commercial and similar employees into state employees is perfectly feasible, both technically (thanks to the preliminary work accomplished for us by capitalism and finance capitalism) and politically, provided control and supervision are exercised by the Soviets.

As for the higher employees, of whom there are very few, and who incline towards the capitalists, we shall have to treat them as we treat the capitalists—with severity. They, like the capitalists, will offer resistance, and this resistance will have to be broken. And if the immortally naive Peshekhonov, like the true “infant statesman” he is, lisped in June 1917 that “the resistance of the capitalists has been broken,” this childish phrase, this childish swagger, this boyish sally, will be turned by the proletariat into reality.

That we can do, for it is merely a question of smashing the resistance of an insignificant minority of the population, literally a handful of people, over every one of whom the employees’ unions, the trade unions, the consumers’ societies and the Soviets will institute such supervision that every Tit Titych¹ will be as completely encompassed as the French at Sedan.* We know them all by name: we have only to take the lists of directors, members of boards, big shareholders, and so forth. There are a few hundred of them in the whole of Russia, at most a few thousand, each of whom the proletarian state, with its Soviet apparatus, its employees’ unions, and so forth, can surround with tens or hundreds of controllers, so that, most likely, instead of “smashing the resistance,” we may succeed with the help of workers’ control (over the capitalists) in rendering such resistance impossible.

The vital thing will be not so much the confiscation of capitalist property as the establishment of universal, all-embracing workers' control over the capitalists and their possible supporters. Confiscation alone will lead us nowhere, for it does not contain the element of organisation, accounting, or correct distribution. Confiscation might easily be replaced by a fair tax (levied, for instance, on the Shingarev scale),* provided only that we make it impossible to escape rendering returns, conceal the truth, or evade the law. And only workers' control in a workers' state can eliminate this possibility.

¹ See footnote to p. 237.—Ed.

Compulsory trustification, i.e., compulsory amalgamation into associations under the control of the state, is what capitalism has prepared the way for, and what the Junker state has put into effect in Germany. This will be fully realisable in Russia by the Soviets and the dictatorship of the proletariat. And this will give us a "state apparatus," universal, new and non-bureaucratic.¹

* * *

The fourth argument of the advocates of the bourgeoisie is that the proletariat will be unable to wield the state apparatus. This argument, in comparison with the preceding one, contains nothing new. The old apparatus, of course, we could neither get control of nor wield. The new apparatus, the Soviets, is already being wielded by the "mighty impulse of the genuine creative spirit of the people." This apparatus must only be freed of the shackles in which it was placed by the domination of the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik leaders. This apparatus is already being wielded; all that is needed is to rid it of the monstrous petty-bourgeois deadweight that is preventing it from advancing at full speed.

Two circumstances must here be examined to supplement what has already been said: first, the new methods of control, which were created not by us but by capitalism in its military-imperialist stage; secondly, the importance of a more profound democracy in the administration of a state of the proletarian type.

The grain monopoly and the bread ration cards were created not by us, but by the capitalist state at war. The latter has already within the framework of capitalism established universal labour service, that is, the military penal prisons for workers. Here, too, as in all its historical creative work, the proletariat takes its weapons from capitalism; it does not invent them or create them out of nothing.

¹ For more details about the meaning of compulsory trustification see my pamphlet The Threatening Catastrophe and How to Fight It.

The grain monopoly, the bread cards and universal labour service in the hands of the proletarian state, in the hands of the sovereign Soviets, will become a powerful instrument of accounting and control, an instrument which, extended to the capitalists and the rich in general, and applied to them by the workers, will constitute a force unprecedented in history for setting the state apparatus in motion, for overcoming the resistance of the capitalists and subjecting them to the proletarian state. This instrument of control and of compelling people to work will be more effective than the laws of the Convention and its guillotine. The guillotine only intimidated, it only crushed active resistance. For us that is not enough.

For us that is not enough. We must not only intimidate the capitalists so that they feel the might of the proletarian state and forget to think of actively resisting it; we must crush also their passive resistance, which is undoubtedly much more dangerous and harmful. We must not only crush all resistance; we must get people to work within the new organisation of the state. It is not enough to "get rid" of the capitalists; it is necessary (after getting rid of the useless ones, the incorrigible resisters) to employ them in the service of the new state. This applies to the capitalists as well as to the higher bourgeois intellectuals, office workers, etc.

And we have the required means. We have received the means and weapons from the capitalist state at war—the grain monopoly, the bread cards and universal labour service. "He who toils not, neither shall he eat"—that is the basic, prime and chief rule which the Soviets of Workers' Deputies can and will introduce as soon as they become the governing power.

Every worker has a work book. This document does not humiliate him, although at the present time it is undoubtedly a document of capitalist wage slavery, a certificate of the fact that the working man belongs to some or other parasite.

The Soviets will institute the work book for the rich, and then gradually extend it to the whole population (in a peasant country, the work book will probably for a long time to come be unnecessary for the overwhelming majority of the peasants). The work book will cease to be the insignia of the "rabble," it will cease to be a document of the "lower" orders, a certificate of wage slavery. It will be converted into a document testifying that in the new society there are no longer any "workers," but that, on the other hand, there is nobody who does not work.

The rich will be obliged to procure a work book from the union of workers or employees to which their particular sphere of activity is most akin. Every week, or at some other stated interval, they will have to obtain a certificate from that union to the effect that they are performing their work conscientiously; otherwise they will not be able to obtain their bread card or food products generally. We need good organisers in banking and in amalgamating enterprises (in these matters the capitalists have had more experience, and work goes more smoothly with experienced people); we need more engineers, agronomists, technicians, scientifically trained experts of every kind, than ever before. We shall entrust all such workers with tasks to which they are accustomed and with which they can cope. We shall probably only gradually introduce equality of pay for all work in its full extent, leaving a higher rate of pay for such experts during the transition period. But we shall put them under comprehensive workers' control; we shall insist on the full and unconditional observance of the rule: "He who toils not, neither shall he eat." As for the organisational form of the work, we shall not invent it, but shall take ready-made from capitalism the banks, syndicates, the best factories, experimental stations, academies, etc.; we shall only need to select the best models furnished by the experience of the most progressive countries.

And, of course, we are not guilty of one atom of utopianism, we are not departing from sober common sense, when we declare that the capitalist class will offer the most stubborn resistance, but that by organising the whole population into Soviets we shall smash that resistance. And while the particularly obstinate and recalcitrant capitalists will of course have to be punished by the confiscation of their property and by imprisonment, the victory of the proletariat will increase the number of cases like the one of which I read, for instance, in today's Izvestiya:

"On October 9 (September 26) two engineers presented themselves to the Central Council of Factory and Workshop Committees and declared that a group of engineers had decided to form a union of Socialist engineers. Considering that the present movement is in fact the beginning of the social revolution, the union places itself at the disposal of the working masses, and in defence of the interests of the workers desires to act in complete harmony with the workers' organisations. The representatives of the Central Council of Factory and Workshop Committees replied that the Council will gladly form within its organisation an engineering section which will embody in its programme the fundamental theses of the First Conference of Factory and Workshop Committees regarding workers' control over production. A joint meeting of delegates of the Central Council of Factory and Workshop Committees and the inaugural group of Socialist engineers will be held at an early date." (Izvestiya, October 10 [September 27], 1917.)

The proletariat, we are told, will be unable to wield the state apparatus.

Russia after the 1905 Revolution was ruled by 130,000 landlords. They ruled by the aid of unremitting violence perpetrated on 150,000,000 people, by subjecting them to endless humiliation, and by condemning the vast majority to inhuman toil and to semi-starvation.

And yet we are told that Russia cannot be governed by the 240,000 members of the Bolshevik Party,* governing in the interests of the poor and against the rich. These 240,000 already have the support of not less than 1,000,000 votes of the adult population, for that is the proportion between the number of members of the Party and the number of votes cast for it, as established both by the experience of Europe and by the experience of Russia, as, for instance, in the August elections to the Petrograd Duma. And here we already have a "state apparatus" of one million persons, devoted to the socialist state not for the sake of a fat sum every twentieth of the month, but for the sake of an ideal.

Moreover, we have a magic means of increasing our state apparatus tenfold at one stroke, such as no capitalist state possessed or could ever hope to possess. This magic means is to get the toilers, the poor, to share in the day-to-day work of governing the state.

In order to make it clear how simple it will be to apply this magic means, and how faultless its action will be, let us take as plain and obvious an example as possible.

The state has forcibly to evict a family from a house and to install another. That is done time and again by the capitalist state, and it will also be done by our state, the proletarian or socialist state.

The capitalist state evicts a workers' family which has lost its breadwinner and is unable to pay rent. A bailiff appears with a whole squad of police or "militia." In a working class district a whole detachment of Cossacks is necessary in order to effect an eviction. Why? Because the bailiff and "militiaman" refuse to go without strong military protection. They know that the sight of an eviction arouses such fury in the neighbourhood, among thousands of people who have been driven to the verge of desperation, arouses such hatred towards the capitalists and the capitalist state, that the bailiff and the squad of militiamen might at any moment be torn to pieces. Large military forces are required; several regiments of soldiers have to be brought into the town from some distant province, in order that the soldiers may be indifferent to the life of the poor of the town and may not become "infected" by socialism.

The proletarian state finds it necessary forcibly to install some needy family in the dwelling of a rich man. Our detachment of workers' militia consists, let us say, of fifteen people—two sailors, two soldiers, two class conscious workers (of whom only one, let us assume, is a member of our Party or a sympathiser), one intellectual, and eight members of the toiling poor; at least five must necessarily be women, domestic servants, unskilled workers, and so on. The detachment comes to the rich man's apartment, inspects it, and finds that there are five rooms occupied by two men and two women. "This winter, citizens, you must confine yourselves to two rooms and place two rooms at the disposal of two families that are now living in cellars. For the time being, until with the help of engineers (you are an engineer, I think?) we build good dwellings for all, you will have to put yourselves to inconvenience. Your telephone will serve ten families. That will save about a hundred hours' work in running to the stores, and so forth. Moreover, in your family there are two unengaged semi-ablebodied workers capable of performing light service—a woman citizen of fifty-five and a citizen of fourteen. They will do duty for three hours daily in superintending the distribution of products for the ten families and in keeping the necessary accounts. The student citizen in our detachment will write out two copies of the text of this state order and you will be kind enough to give us a signed declaration that you undertake to abide by it faithfully."

Such clear examples, in my opinion, give an idea of the difference between the old bourgeois and the new socialist state apparatus and state administration.

We are not utopians. We know that not every labourer or cook could at present undertake the administration of the state. In this we agree with the Cadets, and with Breshkovskaya and Tseretelli. But we differ from these citizens in that we demand the immediate abandonment of the prejudice that assumes that only the rich, or officials picked from rich families, are capable of governing the state, of performing the daily routine work of administration. We demand that the class conscious workers and soldiers should conduct the training in the business of state administration, and that this should be begun immediately, i.e., that all the toilers, all the poor should begin to be trained to this business immediately.

We know that the Cadets are also willing to teach the people democracy. Cadet ladies are willing to give lectures to domestic servants on women's rights, in accordance with the best French and English authorities. Also, at the very next concert-meeting, before an audience of thousands, a general exchange of kisses will be arranged on the platform: the Cadet lady lecturer will kiss Breshkovskaya, Breshkovskaya will kiss ex-Minister Tseretelli, and a grateful people will thus obtain an object lesson in republican equality, liberty and fraternity. . . .

Yes, we agree that the Cadets, Breshkovskaya and Tseretelli are in their way devoted to the cause of democracy, and are carrying on propaganda for it among the people. But what is to be done if our idea of democracy is somewhat different from theirs?

In our opinion, in order to mitigate the untold burdens and miseries of the war, in order to heal the terrible wounds inflicted on the people by the war, revolutionary democracy is necessary, revolutionary measures are needed, of the kind described in the example of the allocation of dwellings in the interests of the poor. We must proceed in exactly the same way, in both town and country, with regard to foodstuffs, clothes, boots, and so forth, and in the country with regard to the land, etc. For the administration of the state in this spirit we can immediately set up a state apparatus of about ten million, if not twenty million people—an apparatus unknown to any capitalist country. We alone can create such an apparatus, for we are assured of the complete and devoted sympathy of the vast majority of the population. This apparatus we alone can create, because we have class conscious workers, disciplined by a long capitalist “apprenticeship” (not for naught did we serve apprenticeship to capitalism), workers who are capable of forming a workers’ militia and of gradually enlarging it (beginning to enlarge it immediately) into a people’s militia. The class conscious workers must lead, but they can draw into the work of administration the real masses of the toiling oppressed.

Of course, mistakes will be inevitable in the first steps taken by this new apparatus. But did the peasants make no mistakes when, emerging from serfdom into freedom, they began to manage their own affairs? Is there any other way to teach the people to manage their own affairs and to avoid mistakes than by actual practice, than by immediately proceeding to genuine popular self-government? The most important thing at present is to abandon the bourgeois-intellectual prejudice that only special officials, who by their whole social position are entirely dependent on capital, can perform the work of administration of the state. The most important thing is to put an end to the state of affairs in which the bourgeois, the officials and the “Socialist” ministers try to manage the state in the old way, and fail, so that after seven months, in a peasant country, they are faced with a peasant revolt! The most important thing is to inspire the oppressed and the toilers with confidence in their own strength, to show them in practice that they can and must themselves undertake a correct, strictly orderly and organised distribution of bread, food, milk, clothing, dwellings, and so forth, in the interests of the poor. Without this, Russia cannot be saved from collapse and ruin; whereas an honest, courageous and universal move to hand over the administration to the proletarians and semi-proletarians will arouse such unprecedented revolutionary enthusiasm among the masses, will so multiply the forces of the people in combating their miseries, that much that seemed impossible to our old, narrow, bureaucratic forces will become practicable for the forces of the millions and millions of the masses when they begin to work for themselves and not under the whip, for the capitalist, the master, the official.

* * *

The question of the state apparatus also involves the question of centralism, which was raised so very vigorously and so very unhappily by Comrade Bazarov in No. 138 of Novaya Zhizn, of October 10 (September 27), in an article entitled "The Bolsheviks and the Problem of Power."

Comrade Bazarov reasons as follows: "The Soviets are not an apparatus adapted to all spheres of state life," for, allegedly, seven months' experience has proved, and "tens and hundreds of documents in the possession of the Economic Section of the Petrograd Executive Committee" have confirmed, that, although in many places the Soviets virtually enjoyed "sovereign power," nevertheless, "they were unable to achieve any satisfactory results in combating economic disorganisation." What is required is an apparatus "divided according to branches of production, strictly centralised within the limits of each branch, and subordinated to one general state centre." "It is not a question"—be good enough to observe—"of replacing the old apparatus, but of reforming it . . . however much the Bolsheviks may scoff at people with a plan. . . ."

These observations of Comrade Bazarov are amazing for their helplessness. They are an exact copy of the arguments of the bourgeoisie, a reflection of its class point of view.

And, indeed, to assert that the Soviets anywhere in Russia, and at any time, enjoyed "sovereign power" is simply absurd (if not a mere repetition of the self-interested class lie of the capitalists). Sovereign power implies power over all the land, the banks and the factories. Anybody with the least knowledge of historical experience and of the scientific facts concerning the connection between politics and economics could not have "forgotten" this "trifling" circumstance.

It is the lying trick of the bourgeoisie, while denying the Soviets power, while sabotaging every in any way serious measure of the Soviets, while retaining the government in its own hands and retaining the power over the land, the banks, and so on, to throw the blame for the economic disruption on the Soviets! That is the essence of the whole deplorable experience of the coalition.

The Soviets never possessed sovereign power, and their measures could result in nothing but palliatives and still greater confusion.

Demonstrating the need for centralism to the Bolsheviks, who are centralists by conviction, by their programme and by the whole tactics of their Party, is indeed hammering at an open door. The writers of Novaya Zhizn engage in such useless occupations only because they have completely failed to understand why we scoff at their "general state" point of view. And the Novaya Zhizn-ists fail to understand this because they recognise the doctrine of the class struggle only verbally, and not with their intelligence. While repeating by rote phrases regarding the class struggle, they are forever straying into a "super-class point of view" that is ridiculous in theory and reactionary in practice. And this fawning on the bourgeoisie they call a "general state" plan.

The state, dear people, is a class concept. The state is an organ or machine for the exercise of force by one class against another. As long as it is a machine for the exercise of force by the bourgeoisie against the proletariat, the only slogan for the proletariat must be to smash that state. But when the state becomes proletarian, when it becomes a machine for the exercise of force by the proletariat against the bourgeoisie, then we shall be fully and unreservedly in favour of a strong state power and centralism.

To put it more popularly, we are not scoffing at "plans," but at the fact that Bazarov and Co. fail to understand that in rejecting "workers' control," in rejecting the "dictatorship of the proletariat," they are supporting the dictatorship of the bourgeoisie. There is no middle course; a middle course is but the futile dream of the petty-bourgeois democrat.

Not a single central body, not a single Bolshevik has ever argued against the Soviets' being centralised, against their being united. None of us has ever objected to organising factory and shop committees according to branch of production and to their centralisation. Bazarov is aiming beside the mark.

We scoff, have scoffed, and shall continue to scoff, not at "centralism," not at "plans," but at reformism. For your reformism is exceedingly comical after the experience of the coalition. And when one talks "not of replacing the apparatus, but of reforming it," one is a reformist, one has become a reformist democrat instead of a revolutionary democrat. Reformism simply means concessions by the ruling class, and not its overthrow; it means that concessions are made by the ruling class, but that the power remains in its hands.

And that is just what has been tried by half a year of coalition.

It is that we are scoffing at. Bazarov, never having mastered the doctrine of the class struggle, allows himself to be caught by the bourgeoisie, who sing in unison: "Just so, just so—we are not opposed to reform, we are in favour of the participation of the workers in general state control; we fully agree to that." And the good Bazarov objectively plays the part of chorus for the capitalists.

This has always been, and always will be, the case with people who, in times of acute class struggle, endeavour to occupy a "middle" position. And it is because the writers of Novaya Zhizn are incapable of understanding the class struggle that their policy is such a ridiculous and eternal vacillation between the bourgeoisie and the proletariat.

Occupy yourselves with "planning," dear citizens—that is not politics, that is not the class struggle; in that sphere you may indeed be of use to the people. You have many economists on your paper. Join forces with engineers, and so forth, who are prepared to work on the question of regulating production and distribution. Devote a page of your big "apparatus" (your paper) to a business-like investigation of exact data on the production and distribution of goods in Russia, on the banks, syndicates, etc., etc. That is where you can be of benefit to the people, where your sitting between two stools can do no great harm; such work on "plans" will earn you the gratitude and not the ridicule of the workers.

When the proletariat is victorious it will act as follows: it will set the economists, engineers, agricultural experts, etc., under the control of the workers' organisations, to work out a "plan," to test it, to seek means of saving labour by centralisation, and to seek for the simplest, cheapest, most convenient and universal methods of control. We shall pay economists, statisticians and technicians good money for this, but—we shall give them nothing to eat unless they perform the work conscientiously and entirely in the interests of the toilers.

We are in favour of centralism and of a "plan," but it must be the centralism and the plan of a proletarian state—it must be a proletarian regulation of production and distribution in the interests of the poor, the toilers, the exploited, against the interests of the exploiters. The concept "general state centre" we agree to understand as implying only that which smashes the resistance of the capitalists, which gives sovereign power to the majority of the people, i.e., to the proletarians and semi-proletarians—the workers and the poor peasants.

* * *

The fifth argument is that the Bolsheviks cannot retain power because "the circumstances are exceptionally complicated."

Oh, wiseacres! They are prepared, forsooth, to reconcile themselves to the revolution, provided only the circumstances are not "exceptionally complicated."

Such revolutions never occur, and the sighs for such a revolution are but the reactionary lament of the bourgeois intellectual.

Even were a revolution to begin under circumstances that appeared not very complicated, the development of the revolution itself would invariably create exceptionally complicated circumstances. For a revolution, a genuine and profound revolution, a "people's" revolution, to use Marx's expression, is an incredibly complicated and painful process in which the old social order dies away and a new social order, a new order of living for tens of millions of people, is born. Revolution is a most acute, savage and desperate class struggle and civil war. Not a single great revolution in history has been able to dispense with civil war; and only a "man in a muffler"* can think that civil war is conceivable without "exceptionally complicated circumstances."

Had the circumstances not been exceptionally complicated, there would have been no revolution. If you are afraid of wolves, don't go into the forest.

There is nothing to discuss in this fifth argument, for it is devoid of economic or political meaning, or meaning of any kind, for that matter. It is but the lamentation of people who are distressed and frightened by the revolution. As an illustration of such lamentation, I shall take the liberty of citing two slight personal reminiscences.

I had a conversation with a wealthy engineer not long before the July days. The engineer had at one time been a revolutionary, a member of the Social-Democratic Party, and even of the Bolshevik Party, but now he was all fear and rage at the turbulent and undauntable workers. "If they were at least workers like the German!" he said (he was an educated man and had been abroad). "Of course, I understand that, generally speaking, the social revolution is inevitable. But in our country, when the standard of the workers has been so lowered by the war! . . . No, that is not revolution, it is an abyss."

He was willing to accept the social revolution if history would lead to it in as peaceful, quiet, smooth and orderly a manner as a German express glides into a station. A sedate conductor opens the carriage door and announces: "Social Revolution Station! Alle aussteigen (all alight here)!" In which case, what objection could there be to passing from a position of engineer to the Tit Tityches to a position of engineer to the workers' organisations?

This man has seen strikes. He knows what a storm of passion the most ordinary strike always arouses even in the most peaceful times. He understands, of course, how many million times greater must this storm be when the class struggle has aroused the whole toiling population of this enormous country, when millions of people who have been tortured for centuries by the landlords and robbed and downtrodden for decades by capitalists and tsarist officials have been driven by war and exploitation almost to the point of despair. He understands all this "theoretically"; he admits all this verbally. But he is scared by the "exceptionally complicated circumstances."

After the July days I was obliged, as a result of the extremely solicitous attention with which I was honoured by the Keren-sky government, to go underground. Of course, it is the workers who shelter people like us. In an outlying working class suburb of Petrograd, in a small working class house, dinner is being served. The hostess places bread on the table. "Look," says the host, "what fine bread. 'They' dare not give us bad bread now. And we had almost forgotten that good bread could be had in Petrograd."

I was amazed at this class evaluation of the July days. My mind had been revolving around the political significance of the event, weighing its importance in relation to the general course of events, analysing the situation that had given rise to this zigzag of history and the situation it would create, and debating how we must alter our slogans and Party apparatus in order to adapt them to the changed situation. As for bread, I, who had never experienced want, never gave it a thought. Bread to me seemed a matter of course, a by-product, as it were, of the work of a writer. Fundamentally, the mind approaches the class struggle for bread by a political analysis and an extraordinarily complicated and involved path.

But this representative of the oppressed class, although one of the better-paid and well-educated workers, took the bull by the horns with that astonishing simplicity and bluntness, with that firm resolution and amazingly clear insight, which is as remote from your intellectual as the stars in the sky. The whole world is divided into two camps: "we," the toilers, and "they," the exploiters. Not the slightest embarrassment over what had happened—for him it was just one of the battles in the long struggle of labour against capital: when wood is cut, chips will fly.

"What a terrible thing, these 'exceptionally complicated circumstances' of the revolution!"—that is the way the bourgeois intellectual thinks and feels.

"We have put the screw on 'them'; 'they' dare not make trouble now. If we tighten the screw still more we shall get rid of them altogether"—that is the way the worker thinks and feels.

* * *

The sixth and last argument is that the proletariat "will be unable to resist the pressure of hostile forces which will sweep away not only the dictatorship of the proletariat, but the whole revolution."

Do not try to scare us, gentlemen, you will not succeed. We have seen such hostile forces and their pressure in the case of Kornilovism (from which Kerenskyism in no way differs). Everybody saw, and all the people remember, how Kornilov's forces were routed by the proletariat and the poor peasantry and how pitiful and helpless proved to be the position of the supporters of the bourgeoisie and the small number of representatives of the more well-to-do small local landlords, who are particularly hostile to the revolution. Dyelo Naroda of October 13 (September 30), trying to persuade the workers to "endure" Kerenskyism (i.e., Kornilovism) and Tseretelli's fake Bulygin Duma * until the convocation of the Constituent Assembly (convened under the protection of "military measures" against the rebellious peasants!), reiterates this sixth argument of Novaya Zhizn with great gusto, and screams till it is hoarse: "The Kerensky government will never submit" (i.e., to the government of Soviets, the government of the workers and peasants, which Dyelo Naroda, not to be outdone by the pogromists and anti-Semites, the monarchists and Cadets, calls the government of "Trotsky and Lenin"; such are the lengths to which the Socialist-Revolutionaries will go!).

But neither Dyelo Naroda nor Novaya Zhizn can frighten the class conscious workers. "The Kerensky government," you say, "will never submit"—that is, to put it more bluntly and clearly, it will repeat the Kornilov affair. And the gentlemen of Dyelo Naroda dare to call this a "civil war," to speak of it as a "terrible prospect"!

No, gentlemen, you will not deceive the workers. That will not be civil war, but a hopeless mutiny of a handful of Kornilovists. If their desire is not to submit to the people and to provoke a repetition on a larger scale of what happened to the Kornilovists at Viborg, if the Socialist-Revolutionaries desire this, if the member of the Socialist-Revolutionary Party, Kerensky, desires this, he certainly can drive the people to the point of fury. But you will not frighten the workers and soldiers this way, gentlemen.

What unutterable insolence! They fake a new Bulygin Duma, they recruit by fraud a crowd of reactionary co-operators and village kulaks to help them; to these they add the capitalists and landlords (elements possessing the so-called property qualification), and with this band of Kornilovists they want to thwart the will of the people, the will of the workers and peasants.

They have brought affairs in a peasant country to such a pass that a broad stream of peasant revolt is spreading everywhere! Just think of it! In a democratic republic where 80 per cent of the population are peasants, they have driven them to a peasant revolt. . . . This same Dyelo Naroda, Chernov's organ, the organ of the "Socialist-Revolutionaries," which on October 13 (September 30) had the insolence to advise the workers and peasants to "endure," had been obliged, in a leading article on October 12 (September 29) to admit that

"practically nothing has been done up to the present to put an end to the conditions of servitude that still prevail in the country districts of Central Russia."

This same Dyelo Naroda, in the same leading article of October 12 (September 29), says that "the dead hand of Stolypin is still strongly felt in the methods of the 'revolutionary ministers.' "

In other words, to put it clearer and more simply, it calls Kerensky, Nikitin, Kishkin and Co. Stolypinists.

The "Stolypinists," Kerensky and Co., have driven the peasants to revolt, they are now adopting "military measures" against the peasants, and are consoling the people with the convocation of the Constituent Assembly (although Kerensky and Tseretelli have already deceived the people once by solemnly declaring, on July 21 [8], that the Constituent Assembly would be convened on September 30 [17] and then broken their word and, even against the advice of the Menshevik Dan, postponed the Constituent Assembly not to the end of October, as the Menshevik Central Executive Committee of that time desired, but to the end of November). The "Stolypinists," Kerensky and Co., are consoling the people with the promise of an early convocation of the Constituent Assembly, as though the people could trust those who have already played them false in like circumstances, as though the people could believe that the Constituent Assembly will be properly convened by a government which is applying military measures in remote villages, that is, openly conniving at arbitrary arrests of class conscious peasants and at the falsification of the elections.

They drive the peasants to revolt, and then have the effrontery to tell them that they must "endure," that they must wait, and that they must put their trust in a government which is pacifying the rebellious peasants by "military measures."

They drove hundreds of thousands of Russian soldiers to their doom in the offensive undertaken after July 2 (June 19); they are dragging out the war at a time when German sailors are mutinying and throwing their superiors overboard;* they have brought matters to such a pass, all the time uttering fine phrases about peace, but not proposing a just peace to the belligerent nations. And yet they have the effrontery to tell the workers and peasants, to tell the dying soldiers to endure, to trust the government of the "Stolypinist" Kerensky, to have faith another month in the Kornilov generals—in that month they may deliver a few more tens of thousands of soldiers to the slaughter. . . . "Endure"!

Is this not shameless insolence?

No, Messieurs the Socialist-Revolutionaries and party colleagues of Kerensky—you will not deceive the soldiers!

The workers and soldiers will not endure the Kerensky government a single day, a single extra hour, for they know that the Soviet government will immediately propose a just peace to all the belligerents, and will therefore in all probability achieve an immediate armistice and an early peace.

The soldiers of our peasant army will not endure the Kerensky government, which is pacifying the peasant revolt by military measures, for a single day, a single extra hour against the will of the Soviets.

No, Messieurs the Socialist-Revolutionaries and party colleagues of Kerensky—you will not deceive the workers and peasants any longer.

* * *

As to the pressure of the hostile forces, which, according to the assurances of the mortally terrified Novaya Zhizn, will sweep away the dictatorship of the proletariat, we have here another monstrous logical and political error, which only people who have allowed themselves to be frightened almost out of their wits can fail to see.

You say "the pressure of hostile forces will sweep away the dictatorship of the proletariat." Very well. But you are all economists and educated people, dear fellow-citizens. You know that to compare democracy with the bourgeoisie is senseless and sheer ignorance, equivalent to comparing pounds with yards. For there is a democratic bourgeoisie and there are strata of the petty bourgeoisie which are non-democratic (capable of a Vendée*).

"Hostile forces" is a mere phrase. The class concept is the bourgeoisie (supported by the landlords).

The bourgeoisie and the landlords; the proletariat; the petty bourgeoisie—petty proprietors, primarily the peasants—these are the three fundamental "forces" into which Russia, like every capitalist country, is divided. These are the three fundamental "forces" which have long ago been demonstrated in every capitalist country (including Russia) both by scientific economic analysis and by the political experience of the modern history of all countries, by the experience of every European revolution since the eighteenth century, and by the experience of the two Russian revolutions of 1905 and 1917.

And so you hold out the threat to the proletarians that their power will be swept away by the bourgeoisie? That can be the only meaning of your threat; it has no other significance.

Very well. If it is true that the bourgeoisie can sweep away the power of the workers and poor peasants, then nothing else remains but a coalition, i.e., an alliance, or understanding, between the petty bourgeoisie and the bourgeoisie. Nothing else is even thinkable!

But the coalition was tried for half a year and led to collapse, and you yourselves, dear but dense citizens of Novaya Zhizn, renounced coalition.

What is the result?

You have become so muddled, citizens of Novaya Zhizn, you have allowed yourselves to be so scared, that you are incapable even of the most simple mental process, you are unable to count up to three, let alone to five.

Either the entire power passes to the bourgeoisie—this you have long ceased advocating; and even the bourgeoisie dare not hint at it, knowing that the people have once already, on May 3-4 (April 20-21), overthrown such a power by one lift of the shoulders, and would do so now with thrice the determination and ruthlessness. Or the entire power passes to the petty bourgeoisie—in other words, to a coalition between it and the bourgeoisie, for the petty bourgeoisie cannot, and has no desire, to take power independently, as has been proved by the experience of all revolutions and by economic science, which explains that in a capitalist country one may support capital or one may support labour, but that one cannot adopt a middle course. This coalition in Russia tried dozens of methods in the course of half a year, and failed.

Or, finally, the entire power passes to the proletarians and the poor peasants and is turned against the bourgeoisie in order to break its resistance. This has not yet been tried, and from this you, gentlemen of Novaya Zhizn, are dissuading the people, trying to frighten them by instilling in them your own fear of the bourgeoisie.

No fourth course is thinkable.

Consequently, if Novaya Zhizn is afraid of the dictatorship of the proletariat and rejects it because of the possibility of a proletarian power being defeated by the bourgeoisie, it is surreptitiously returning to the position of compromise with the capitalists!!! It is clear as daylight that if one fears resistance, does not believe in the possibility of smashing that resistance, and says to the people: "Beware of the resistance of the capitalists, you cannot cope with it"—one is by that very fact calling again for a compromise with the capitalists.

Novaya Zhizn is helplessly and pitifully confused, as are now all the petty-bourgeois democrats, who see the collapse of the coalition, dare not defend it openly, and, being at the same time protected by the bourgeoisie, fear the sovereign power of the proletariat and the poor peasantry.

* * *

How disgraceful it is to call oneself a revolutionary, to desire to be reckoned a Socialist, and yet be afraid of the resistance of the capitalists! How international Socialism, corrupted by opportunism, has fallen ideologically if such voices can be raised!

We have already seen, and the whole nation has seen, the strength of resistance of the capitalists. For the capitalists are more class conscious than other classes and at once realised the significance of the Soviets; they at once bent every effort, adopted every device, went to the length of the most atrocious lies and slanders, resorted to military plots—all in order to destroy the Soviets, to reduce their power to naught, to prostitute them (with the help of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks), to transform them into talkshops, and to tire out the peasants and workers by month after month of empty chatter and play at revolution.

But we have not yet seen the strength of resistance of the proletarians and poor peasants. For the full measure of this strength will be revealed only when the power has passed into the hands of the proletariat, when tens of millions of people who had been crushed by want and capitalist slavery will see from their own experience, will feel, that the power of the state has passed into the possession of the oppressed classes, that the power of the state is helping the poor to combat the landlords and capitalists and smashing their resistance. Only then shall we be able to see what untapped forces of resistance to capitalism are latent in the people; only then will what Engels calls "latent socialism" be made apparent; only then shall we find that for every ten thousand open or concealed enemies of the power of the working class, who manifest themselves either by action or by passive resistance, a million new fighters will arise, who until then had been politically dormant, languishing in poverty and despair, having lost faith in themselves as human beings, in their right to live, in the possibility that they too might be served by the whole force of the modern centralised state and that their detachments of proletarian militia might be fully trusted and called upon to take part in the immediate, direct, day-to-day work of administration of the state.

The capitalists and landlords, with the gracious assistance of the Plekhanovs, Breshkovskayas, Tseretellis, Chernovs, and Co., have done everything to defile the democratic republic, to defile it by servility to wealth; they have done this to such an extent that the people are giving way to apathy and indifference. It is all the same to them, for a hungry man cannot distinguish between a republic and a monarchy; a freezing, shoeless, weary soldier, perishing for the interests of others, is in no condition to love a republic.

But when every labourer, every unemployed worker, every cook, every ruined peasant sees—not from the newspapers, but with his own eyes—that the proletarian government is not cringing to wealth, but is helping the poor; that this government does not hesitate to adopt revolutionary measures; that it takes surplus products from the parasites and gives them to the hungry; that it forcibly installs the homeless into the dwellings of the rich; that it forces the rich to pay for milk, but does not give them a single drop of it until the children of all poor families have received an adequate supply; that the land is passing into the possession of the toilers, and the factories and banks are passing under the control of the workers; that immediate and severe punishment is being meted out to millionaires who conceal their riches—when the poor see and feel this, then no forces of the capitalists and kulaks, the forces of international finance capital, which manipulates hundreds of billions of money, will be able to defeat the people's revolution. On the contrary, the people's revolution will conquer the whole world, for in every country the socialist revolution is ripening.

Our revolution will be invincible if it is not afraid of itself and entrusts the sovereign power to the proletariat. For behind us stand the immeasurably larger, more developed and more organised world forces of the proletariat, which have been temporarily repressed by the war, but not destroyed; in fact, they have been only multiplied by the war.

* * *

To fear that the power of the Bolsheviks—i.e., the power of the proletariat, which is assured the unlimited support of the poor peasantry, will be "swept away" by the capitalists—what short-sightedness that is! What disgraceful fear of the people, what hypocrisy! Those who betray this fear belong to that "upper" (by capitalist standards, but in reality rotten) "society" who utter the word "justice" without themselves believing in it, by habit, as a phrase to which they attach no meaning.

Here is an example:

Mr. Peshekhonov is a well-known semi-Cadet. A more moderate Trudovik, sharing the views of the Breshkovskayas and Plekhanovs, it would be difficult to find. There was never a minister more servile to the bourgeoisie; the world has never seen a warmer partisan of "coalition," of compromise with the capitalists.

And here is the admission this gentleman was obliged to make in his speech at the "Democratic" (read Bulygin) Conference, as reported by the defencist Izvestiya:

"There are two programmes. One is a programme of group demands, of class and national demands. This programme is most frankly advocated by the Bolsheviks. But the other sections of democracy also do not find it easy to reject this programme. For they are the demands of the toiling masses, of the ill-treated and oppressed nationalities. It is not so easy, therefore, for the democrats to break with the Bolsheviks, to renounce these class demands, all the more since these demands are essentially just. But this programme, for which we fought before the revolution, for the sake of which we made the revolution, and which under other circumstances we all would have supported very solidly, presents, under existing circumstances, a great danger. The danger is now all the greater since these demands have to be advanced at a moment when it is impossible for the state to comply with them. We must first defend the whole—the state; it must be saved from disaster, and there is only one way to do that, namely, to satisfy no demands, however just and cogent they may be, but, on the contrary, to impose restrictions and sacrifices which must be contributed from all quarters." (Izvestiya of the Central Executive Committee, September 30 [17].)

Mr. Peshekhonov does not understand that as long as the capitalists are in power he is defending not the whole, but the avaricious interests of Russian and "Allied" imperialist capital. Mr. Peshekhonov does not understand that the war will cease to be an imperialist war of conquest and plunder only after a break is made with the capitalists, with their secret treaties, their annexations (i.e., seizure of foreign lands) and their banking and financial roguery. Mr. Peshekhonov does not understand that only then would the war become—if the enemy were to reject a formal proposal for a just peace—a defensive and just war. Mr. Peshekhonov does not understand that the power of defence of a country that had rid itself of the yoke of capitalism, given the land to the peasants and placed the banks and factories under the control of the workers, would be many times greater than the power of defence of a capitalist country.

And, most important of all, Mr. Peshekhonov does not understand that when he is forced to admit the justice of Bolshevism, to admit that its demands are the demands of the "toiling masses," i.e., of the majority of the population, he is thereby surrendering his whole position, the position of the petty-bourgeois democrats.

That is where our strength lies. Our government will be invincible because even our antagonists are forced to admit that the Bolshevik programme is the programme of the "toiling masses" and the "oppressed nationalities."

Mr. Peshekhonov, you must remember, is the political friend of the Cadets, of the people of Yedinstvo and Dyelo Naroda, of the Breshkovskayas and the Plekhanovs. He is the representative of the kulaks and of those gentlemen whose wives and sisters would come tomorrow with their umbrellas and gouge out the eyes of dying Bolsheviks, were they to be beaten by Kornilov's soldiers or (what is exactly the same thing) by Kerensky's soldiers.

And a gentleman of this type finds himself constrained to admit the justice of the Bolshevik demands.

For him justice is but a phrase. For the masses of the semi-proletarians, however, for the majority of the petty bourgeoisie of town and country, who have been ruined, tortured and exhausted by the war, it is not a phrase, but a most urgent, burning and momentous question, a question of starvation or of a crust of bread. That is why no policy can be based on a "coalition," on a "compromise" between the interests of the impoverished and hungry and the interests of the exploiters. That is why the Bolshevik government is assured the support of the overwhelming majority of these masses.

Justice is an empty word, say the intellectuals and the blackguards who are inclined to declare themselves Marxists on the lofty grounds that they have "contemplated the posterior" of economic materialism.*

Ideas become a power when they seize hold of the masses. And the Bolsheviks, i.e., the representatives of revolutionary proletarian internationalism, have now embodied in their policy the idea which is motivating countless masses of toilers all over the world.

Justice alone, the feelings of the masses indignant at their exploitation alone, would never have led them on to the true path of socialism. But now that, thanks to capitalism, a concrete apparatus of big banks, syndicates, railways, etc. has grown up, now that the rich experience of the advanced countries has amassed a store of technical marvels, the practical application of which is being hampered by capitalism; now that the class conscious workers have formed a closely-knit Party of a quarter of a million members for the purpose of systematically taking this apparatus into their hands and setting it going with the aid of all the toilers and exploited—now that these conditions exist, no force on earth can prevent the Bolsheviks, if they do not allow themselves to be in- timidated and are capable of seizing power, from retaining that power until the triumph of the world socialist revolution.

POSTSCRIPT

The foregoing lines had already been written when an editorial in Novaya Zhizn of October 14 (1) yielded a new pearl of stupidity, which is all the more dangerous since it is concealed under the guise of sympathy for the Bolsheviks, under cover of a sage philistine admonition to the effect that "one must not allow oneself to be provoked" (one must not allow oneself to be caught in a snare by the cry of provocation, which is intended to scare the Bolsheviks and dissuade them from taking power).

Here is the pearl in question:

"The lessons of movements such as those of July 16-18 (3-5) on the one hand, and of the Kornilov days on the other, clearly show that democracy, if it has at its disposal organs enjoying great authority among the population, is invincible when it adopts a defensive position in the civil war; but that it suffers defeat, by losing the intermediate and wavering elements, when it assumes the initiative of offence."*

Were the Bolsheviks to allow themselves to be influenced in any shape or form by the philistine stupidity expressed in this argument, they would cause the ruin both of their Party and of the revolution.

For the author of this argument, in taking it upon himself to talk of civil war (just the sort of subject for a most amiable lady), has perverted the lessons of history in an incredibly comical manner.

Let us see what the representative and founder of proletarian revolutionary tactics, Karl Marx, says about the lessons of history on this question:

"Now, insurrection is an art quite as much as war or any other, and subject to certain rules of proceeding, which, when neglected, will produce the ruin of the party neglecting them. Those rules, logical deductions from the nature of the parties and the circumstances one has to deal with in such a case, are so plain and simple that the short experience of 1848 had made the Germans pretty well acquainted with them. Firstly, never play with insurrection unless you are fully prepared to face the consequences of your play. Insurrection is a calculus with very indefinite magnitudes the value of which may change every day; the forces opposed to you have all the advantage of organisation, discipline, and habitual authority [Marx is referring to the most 'difficult' case of insurrection, viz., against an old and 'firmly established' power, against an army that has not become disintegrated by the influence of the revolution and the vacillations of the government]; unless you bring strong odds against them you are defeated and ruined. Secondly, the insurrectionary career once entered upon, act with the greatest determination, and on the offensive. The defensive is the death of every armed rising; it is lost before it measures itself with its enemies. Surprise your antagonists while their forces are scattering, prepare new successes, however small, but daily; keep up the moral ascendancy which the first successful rising has given to you; rally those vacillating elements to your side which always follow the strongest impulse, and which always look out for the safer side; force your enemies to a retreat before they can collect their strength against you; in the words of Danton, the greatest master of revolutionary policy yet known, de l'audace, de l'audace, encore de l'audace!" (Germany: Revolution and Counter-Revolution.)

We have changed all that, the "also-Marxists" of Novaya Zhizn might say; instead of a triple audacity we have two qualities: "Yes, sir, two—moderation and punctiliousness." The experience of world history and of the great French Revolution is nothing to us. The important thing for "us" is the experience of the two movements of 1917 distorted by Molchalin spectacles.*

But let us examine that experience without these charming spectacles.

You liken July 16-18 (3-5) to a civil war because you believed Alexinsky, Pereverzev and Co. And it is characteristic of the gentlemen of Novaya Zhizn that they believe such people; but, although they have the huge apparatus of a big daily paper at their disposal, they did absolutely nothing themselves independently to gather information regarding July 16-18 (3-5).

But let us assume for a moment that July 16-18 (3-5) was not merely the initial stage of a civil war, deliberately confined to its initial stage by the Bolsheviks, but a real civil war.

What lesson is to be drawn in that case?

First, that the Bolsheviks did not take the offensive; for it is indisputable that had they taken the offensive on the night of July 16 (3), or even on July 17 (4), they would have achieved a great deal. Their defensive position was their weakness, if we are to regard the incident as a civil war (as does Novaya Zhizn, and not as the transformation of a spontaneous outburst into a demonstration of the type of May 3-4 [April 20-21], as the facts show).

And so that "lesson" contradicts the wiseacres of Novaya Zhizn.

Secondly, the reason why the Bolsheviks did not even set themselves the purpose of starting an insurrection on July 16-17 (3-4), and why not a single Bolshevik committee even considered the question, lies outside the scope of our dispute with Novaya Zhizn. For that dispute concerns the lessons of a "civil war," i.e., of an insurrection, and not the circumstance that the obvious lack of a majority restrained the revolutionary party even from the thought of an insurrection.

And since it is a well-known fact that the Bolsheviks secured a majority in the Soviets, both in the capitals and in the country generally (over 49 per cent of the votes in Moscow), much later than July 1917, it again follows that the "lessons" are far, very far, from being those that the very amiable lady, Novaya Zhizn, would have liked to draw.

No, no, citizens of Novaya Zhizn, you had better keep away from politics!

If a revolutionary party has not a majority among the front ranks of the revolutionary classes and in the country generally, there can be no question of insurrection. Furthermore, insurrection requires: 1) that the revolution shall have assumed a national scale; 2) that the old government, for instance the "coalition" government, shall have reached a stage of complete moral and political bankruptcy; 3) that all the intermediate elements, i.e., those who do not fully support the government, although they fully supported it yesterday, shall have reached an extreme state of vacillation.

Why is it that Novaya Zhizn, when speaking of the "lessons" of July 16-18 (3-5), failed even to note this very important lesson? Because non-politicians, members of an intellectual circle, frightened out of their wits by the bourgeoisie, took it upon themselves to discuss a political question.

Thirdly, the facts show that it was precisely after July 16-17 (3-4), as a result of the fact that Messieurs the Tseretellis had exposed themselves by their July policy and that the masses had come to regard the Bolsheviks as their front-rank fighters and the "social bloc-ists"¹ as traitors, that the collapse of the Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries began. The collapse was already fully proved before the Kornilov episode by the results of the elections of September 2 (August 20) in Petrograd,² in which the Bolsheviks were victorious and the "social bloc-ists" routed. (Dyelo Naroda not long ago tried to refute this fact by concealing the results obtained by all the parties. But that is practising deception both on oneself and on one's readers. According to figures quoted by Dyen of September 6 [August 24] referring only to the town, the proportion of votes cast for the Cadets increased from 22 to 23 per cent, while the absolute number of votes cast for them decreased by 40 per cent; the proportion of votes cast for the Bolsheviks increased from 20 to 33 per cent, but their absolute vote decreased only by 10 per cent; the proportion of votes cast for all the "intermediates" decreased from 58 to 44 per cent, while their absolute vote decreased by 60 per cent!)

The collapse of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks between the July days and the Kornilov days is also shown by the growth of the "Left" Wing within both these parties, which reached nearly 40 per cent. That is a "revenge" for the persecution of the Bolsheviks by the Kerenskys.

In spite of the "loss" of a few hundred members, the proletarian party gained enormously from the events of July 16-17 (3-4), for in those stern days the masses saw and realised the devotion of that party and the treachery of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks. The "lessons," it appears, are altogether different from those drawn by Novaya Zhizn, viz., do not abandon the seething masses to the "Molchalins of democracy," and, if you revolt, assume the offensive while the forces of your enemy are still scattered—catch your enemy unawares.

Is that not so, Messieurs the "also-Marxists" of Novaya Zhizn?

Or does Marxism, in your opinion, consist not in making an exact calculation of the objective situation the basis of one's tactics, but in unreasonably and indiscriminately putting into one category both "civil war" and "a Congress of Soviets together with the summoning of the Constituent Assembly"?

¹ I.e., the Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries who formed a bloc with the bourgeoisie.—Ed.

² I.e., to the City and Borough Dumas.—Ed.

Surely, gentlemen, that is ridiculous—a mockery of Marxism and of logic generally!

If the objective state of affairs does not warrant forcing the class struggle to the pitch of a "civil war," why did you talk about "civil war" in connection with "the Congress of Soviets and the Constituent Assembly" (that is the title of the editorial in question in Novaya Zhizn)? If that is the case, you should have plainly told your readers, and proved to them, that the present objective situation provides no grounds for a civil war, and that, therefore, peaceful, constitutionally legal, judicial and parliamentary "simple" things, such as the Congress of Soviets and the Constituent Assembly, must be made the corner-stone of one's tactics. In that case one might share the view that such a congress and such an assembly are really capable of deciding.

If, however, the objective conditions of the moment harbour the inevitability, or, at least, the probability of a civil war, if you are not talking of civil war "at random," but clearly see, feel, and perceive that the conditions for civil war exist, how can you make the Congress of Soviets or the Constituent Assembly your corner-stone? That is simply a mockery of the hungry and tormented masses! What, do you think a starving man will agree to wait two months? Or that economic disruption, regarding the growth of which you yourselves write daily, will consent to wait until the Congress of Soviets or the Constituent Assembly? Or that the German offensive, in the absence of serious steps towards peace on our part (that is, in the absence of a formal proposal to all the belligerents for a just peace), will consent to wait until the Congress of Soviets or the Constituent Assembly? Or have you at your disposal facts that allow you to conclude that the history of the Russian revolution, which from March 13 (February 28) to October 13 (September 30) proceeded with extraordinary force and unprecedented rapidity, will from October 14 (1) to December 12 (November 29) assume a super-tranquil, peaceful and legally balanced pace, excluding explosions, jerks, military defeats and economic crises? Or will the army at the front, of which the non-Bolshevik officer, Dubasov, officially declared in the name of the forces at the front that "they will not fight," will this army consent to starve and freeze calmly until the "appointed" date? Or will the peasant revolt cease to be an element of civil war, merely because you call it "anarchy" and a "pogrom," or because Kerensky sends "military" forces against the peasants? Or is it possible or conceivable that when in a peasant country the government is suppressing a peasant revolt this government can work quietly, genuinely and honestly on the convocation of a Constituent Assembly?

Do not laugh at the "confusion in the Smolny Institute,"* gentlemen! Your own confusion is no less. Your reply to the menacing question of civil war consists of embarrassed phrases and pitiful constitutional illusions. That is why I say that if the Bolsheviks were to yield to such moods they would ruin both their Party and their revolution.

October 14 (1), 1917

A LETTER TO THE BOLSHEVIK COMRADES ATTENDING THE REGIONAL CONGRESS OF THE SOVIETS OF THE NORTHERN REGION *

COMRADES,

Our revolution is passing through a highly critical period. This crisis coincides with the great crisis—the maturing of the world-wide socialist revolution and the struggle waged against that revolution by world imperialism. A gigantic task is being imposed upon the responsible leaders of our Party, failure to perform which will involve the danger of a total collapse of the internationalist proletarian movement. The situation is such that verily, procrastination is like unto death.

Take a glance at the international situation. The growth of a world revolution is beyond dispute. The outburst of indignation on the part of the Czech workers has been suppressed with incredible ferocity, which indicates the extreme fright the government is in. Italy too has witnessed a mass outbreak in Turin. Most important, however, is the mutiny in the German navy. One can imagine the enormous difficulties of a revolution in a country like Germany, especially under present conditions. It cannot be doubted that the mutiny in the German navy is indicative of the great crisis—the maturing of the world revolution. While our chauvinists, who are advocating the defeat of Germany, demand a revolt of the German workers immediately, we Russian revolutionary internationalists know from the experience of 1905-17 that a more impressive sign of the growth of revolution than a mutiny among the troops cannot be imagined.

Just think what our position is now in the eyes of the German revolutionaries. They can say to us: We have only Liebknecht who openly called for a revolution. His voice has been stifled in a convict prison. We have not a single newspaper which openly explains the necessity for a revolution; we have not got freedom of assembly. We have not a single Soviet of Workers' or Soldiers' Deputies. Our voice barely reaches the real, broad masses. Yet we made an attempt at revolt, although our chance was only one in a hundred. But you Russian revolutionary internationalists have behind you a half-year of freedom of agitation; you have a score of newspapers; you have a number of Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies; you have gained the upper hand in the Soviets of both capitals; you have on your side the entire Baltic Fleet and all the Russian troops in Finland. And still you do not respond to our call for revolt, you do not overthrow your imperialist, Kerensky, although the chances are a hundred to one that your revolt will be successful.

Yes, we shall be real traitors to the International if, at such a moment and under such favourable conditions, we respond to such a call of the German revolutionaries with . . . mere resolutions.

Add to this, as we all perfectly well know, that the plotting and conspiracy of the international imperialists against the Russian revolution are rapidly growing. International imperialism is coming more and more to the idea of stifling the revolution at all costs, stifling it both by military measures and by a peace made at the expense of Russia. It is this that is making the crisis in the world socialist revolution so acute, and that is rendering our procrastination in the matter of revolt particularly dangerous—I would almost say criminal.

Take, further, the internal situation of Russia. The petty-bourgeois compromising parties, which expressed the naive confidence of the masses in Kerensky and in the imperialists in general, are absolutely bankrupt, their collapse is complete. The vote cast against coalition by the Soviet curia at the Democratic Conference; the vote cast against coalition by a majority of the local Soviets of Peasants' Deputies (in spite of their Central Soviet, where Avksentyev and other friends of Kerensky's are installed); the elections in Moscow, where the working class population has the closest ties with the peasantry, and where over 49 per cent voted for the Bolsheviks (and among the soldiers fourteen thousand out of seventeen thousand)—does this not signify that the confidence of the masses in Kerensky and in those who are compromising with Kerensky and his friends has totally collapsed? Can one imagine any way in which the masses could say more clearly to the Bolsheviks than they did by this vote: "Lead us, we shall follow you"?

• Are we, who have won the majority of the people over to our side, and who have gained the Soviets of both capitals, to wait? What for? For Kerensky and his Kornilovist generals to surrender Petrograd to the Germans, and thus enter directly or indirectly, overtly or covertly, into a conspiracy with both Buchanan and Wilhelm for the purpose of completely stifling the Russian revolution?

By the Moscow vote and by the elections to the Soviets, the people have expressed their confidence in us, but that is not all. There are signs of growing apathy and indifference. That is easily understood. It implies not the ebb of the revolution, as the Cadets and their henchmen vociferate, but the ebb of confidence in resolutions and elections. In a revolution, the masses demand of the leading parties action, not words; they demand victories in the struggle, not talk. The moment is approaching when the people may conceive the opinion that the Bolsheviks are no better than the others, since they were unable to act when confidence was placed in them. . . .

• The peasant insurrection is spreading over the whole country. It is perfectly clear that the Cadets and their satellites are minimising it in every way and are representing it to be nothing but "pogroms" and "anarchy." That lie is refuted by the fact that in the centres of revolt the land is beginning to be handed over to the peasants. "Pogroms" and "anarchy" have never led to such splendid political results! The tremendous strength of the peasant revolt is shown by the fact that the compromisers and the Socialist-Revolutionaries of Dyelo Naroda, and even Breshko-Breshkovskaya, have begun to talk of giving the land to the peasants in order to stop the movement before it has engulfed them.*

And are we to wait until the Cossack detachments of the Kornilovist Kerensky (who was recently exposed as a Kornilovist by the Socialist-Revolutionaries themselves) succeed in suppressing this peasant uprising piecemeal?

Apparently, many leaders of our Party have failed to note the specific meaning of the slogan which we all adopted and which we have repeated endlessly. The slogan is "All power to the Soviets." There were periods, there were moments during the half-year of the revolution, when this slogan did not imply insurrection. Perhaps those periods and those moments blinded some of our comrades and led them to forget that now, at least since the middle of September, this slogan for us too has become equivalent to a call for insurrection.

There can be no shadow of doubt on this point. Dyelo Naroda recently explained this "in a popular way," when it said, "Kerensky will never submit!" What a question!

The slogan "All power to the Soviets" is a call for revolt. And the blame will be wholly and entirely ours, if we, who for months have been calling upon the masses to revolt and repudiate compromise, fail to lead those masses to revolt on the eve of the collapse of the revolution, after the masses have expressed their confidence in us.

The Cadets and compromisers are trying to scare us by citing the example of July 16-18 (3-5), by pointing to the intensified agitation of the Black Hundreds, and so forth. But if any mistake was made on July 16-18 (3-5), it was that we did not seize power. I think that then there was no mistake, for at that time we were not yet in a majority. But now it would be a fatal mistake, worse than a mistake. The spread of Black Hundred agitation is easily understood; it is an aggravation of extremes in an atmosphere of a developing proletarian and peasant revolution. But to use this as an argument against revolt is ridiculous, for the impotence of the Black Hundred hirelings of the capitalists, the impotence of the Black Hundreds in a fight, does not even require proof. In a fight, Kornilov and Kerensky can rely only upon the support of the "Savage Division" and the Cossacks. And now demoralisation has set in even among the Cossacks; besides, the peasants are threatening them with civil war within their Cossack territories.

I am writing these lines on Sunday, October 21 (8). You will read them not earlier than October 23 (10). I have heard from a comrade who passed through here that people travelling on the Warsaw railroad say, "Kerensky is leading the Cossacks on Petrograd!" This is quite probable, and it will be entirely our fault if we do not verify it most carefully and do not make a study of the strength and distribution of the Kornilovist troops of the second draft.

Kerensky has again brought Kornilovist troops into the vicinity of Petrograd in order to prevent the power of government from passing into the hands of the Soviets, in order to prevent such a government from proposing an immediate peace, in order to prevent all the land from being immediately handed over to the peasantry and in order to surrender Petrograd to the Germans, while he himself escapes to Moscow! That is the slogan of the insurrection which we must circulate as widely as possible and which will meet with a tremendous response.

We must not wait for the All-Russian Congress of Soviets, which the Central Executive Committee may delay even until November. We must not procrastinate and permit Kerensky to bring up more Kornilovist troops. Finland, the fleet and Reval are represented at the Congress of Soviets. These together can start an immediate movement on Petrograd against the Kornilovist regiments, a movement of the fleet, artillery, machine-guns and two or three army corps, such as have shown, for instance in Viborg, the intensity of their hatred for the Kornilovist generals, with whom Kerensky is again in collusion.

It would be a great mistake were we to fail to seize the opportunity of immediately smashing the Kornilovist regiments of the second draft for fear that, by moving into Petrograd, the Baltic Fleet would allegedly expose the front to the Germans. The Kornilovist slanderers will say this, for they will tell any lie, but it is not worthy of revolutionaries to allow themselves to be frightened by lies and slanders. Kerensky will deliver Petrograd to the Germans, that is now as clear as daylight. No assertion to the contrary can shake our utter conviction that that is so, for it follows from the entire course of events and from Kerensky's entire policy.

Kerensky and the Kornilovists will surrender Petrograd to the Germans. And in order to save Petrograd, Kerensky must be overthrown and the power seized by the Soviets of both capitals. These Soviets will immediately propose a peace to all the nations and will thereby fulfil their duty to the German revolutionaries. They will thereby also be taking a decisive step towards frustrating the criminal conspiracies against the Russian revolution, the conspiracies of international imperialism.

Only the immediate movement of the Baltic Fleet, the Finnish troops, and Reval and Kronstadt against the Kornilovist troops quartered near Petrograd can save the Russian and the world revolutions. Such a movement has ninety-nine chances out of a hundred of leading within a few days to the surrender of a part of the Cossack troops, to the complete defeat of the other part, and to the overthrow of Kerensky, for the workers and the soldiers of both capitals will support such a movement.

Verily, procrastination is like unto death.

The slogan "All power to the Soviets" is a slogan of insurrection. Whoever uses this slogan without having grasped and pondered on this will have only himself to blame. And insurrection must be treated as an art. I insisted on this during the Democratic Conference and I insist on it now; because that is what Marxism teaches us, and it is what is being taught us by the present situation in Russia and in the world generally.

It is not a question of voting, of attracting the "Left Socialist-Revolutionaries," of additional provincial Soviets, or of a congress of these Soviets. It is a question of insurrection, which can and must be decided by Petrograd, Moscow, Helsingfors, Kronstadt, Viborg and Reval. In the vicinity of Petrograd and in Petrograd itself—that is where the insurrection can, and must, be decided on and effected. It must be effected as earnestly as possible, with as much preparation as possible, as quickly as possible and as energetically as possible.

The fleet, Kronstadt, Viborg, Reval, can and must advance on Petrograd; they must smash the Kornilov regiments, rouse both the capitals, start a mass agitation for a government which will immediately give the land to the peasants and immediately make proposals for peace, and must overthrow Kerensky's government and establish such a government.

Verily, procrastination is like unto death.

N. LENIN

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF
THE R.S.D.L.P. (BOLSHEVIKS) ON OCTOBER 23 (10), 1917 ***

THE Central Committee recognises that the international position of the Russian revolution (the mutiny in the German navy, which is an extreme manifestation of the growth of the world socialist revolution throughout Europe, and the threat of an imperialist peace for the purpose of strangling the revolution in Russia) and the military situation (the unquestionable decision of the Russian bourgeoisie and of Kerensky and his coadjutors to surrender Petrograd to the Germans), as well as the fact that the proletarian party has gained a majority in the Soviets—that all this, taken in conjunction with the peasant revolt and the swing of popular confidence towards our Party (the elections in Moscow), and, finally, the obvious preparations being made for a second Kornilov affair (the withdrawal of troops from Petrograd, the drafting of Cossacks into Petrograd, the surrounding of Minsk by Cossacks, etc.)—that all this places armed insurrection on the order of the day.

Realising therefore that armed insurrection is inevitable, and that the time for it has fully matured, the Central Committee enjoins all Party organisations to be guided accordingly, and to discuss and decide all practical questions (the Congress of Soviets of the Northern Region, the withdrawal of troops from Petrograd, the action of the people of Moscow and Minsk, etc.) from this point of view.

A LETTER TO THE COMRADES *

COMRADES,

The times we are passing through are so critical, events are moving with such incredible swiftness, that a publicist who by the will of fate has been somewhat removed from the main current of history constantly runs the risk of being belated or of proving not to be au courant, particularly if publication of his writings is delayed. While fully realising this, I am nevertheless constrained to address this letter to the Bolsheviks, in spite of the risk that it may never be published. For the vacillations against which I deem it my duty to protest in the most vigorous manner are outrageous and may have a devastating effect upon the Party, the movement of the international proletariat, and the revolution. As for the danger of being belated, in order to prevent it, I shall indicate what information I possess and of what date.

It was only on the morning of Monday, October 29 (16), that I managed to see a comrade who had been present the previous day at a very important Bolshevik gathering in Petrograd and who gave me a detailed account of the discussion. This discussion centred around the very question of insurrection which was discussed by the Sunday papers of all political trends. All the branches of Bolshevik work in the capital were represented at the meeting by their most influential members. Only an insignificant minority of the meeting, two comrades in all, took up a negative attitude. The arguments these comrades advanced were so feeble, so astoundingly indicative of confusion, fright and bankruptcy with regard to every fundamental idea of Bolshevism and revolutionary-proletarian internationalism, that it is not easy to discover the explanation for such shameful vacillation. But the fact remains; and since a revolutionary party has no right to tolerate vacillation over so serious a question, and since this pretty pair of comrades, who have mislaid their principles, may be the cause of a certain amount of mischief, it is necessary to analyse their arguments, to expose their vacillations and to show how disgraceful they are. The following lines are an attempt to perform this task.

* * *

"... We do not enjoy a majority among the people, and in the absence of that condition insurrection is hopeless. . . ."

People capable of saying this are either distorters of the truth or pedants who desire at all costs, without the slightest regard for the true circumstances of the revolution, to have a guarantee in advance that the Bolshevik Party throughout the country has received exactly one half the number of votes plus one. Never in any revolution has history given such guarantees; and it is absolutely incapable of giving such guarantees. To advance such a demand is to make game of one's audience; it is nothing but a screen for one's flight from the facts.

For the facts patently show that after the July days the majority of the people began rapidly to come over to the side of the Bolsheviks. This was proved by the elections of September 3 (August 20) in Petrograd, even before the Kornilov affair, when the Bolshevik vote rose from 20 to 33 per cent in the city, not counting the suburbs. It was also proved by the elections to the Borough Dumas in Moscow in September, when the Bolshevik vote rose from 11 to 49½ per cent (a Moscow comrade I saw the other day told me that the exact figure is 51 per cent). It was proved by the new elections to the Soviets. It was proved by the fact that the majority of the Peasants' Soviets, the "Avksentyev" Central Soviet notwithstanding, have expressed their opposition to the coalition. To oppose the coalition is in practice to support the Bolsheviks.

Furthermore, reports from the front are with increasing frequency and certainty showing that, in spite of the malicious slanders and attacks of the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik leaders, officers, deputies, etc., the mass of the soldiers are coming over more and more definitely to the side of the Bolsheviks.

Finally, the most outstanding fact of the present-day life of Russia is the revolt of the peasantry.* Here we have the fact that the people are passing over to the Bolsheviks demonstrated not by words, but by deeds. For, notwithstanding the lies of the bourgeois press and its wretched chorus of "vacillating" Novaya Zhizn-ists and so forth, who shriek of pogroms and anarchy, the fact is there. The movement of the peasants in the Tambov Gubernia was a revolt, both from the physical and from the political point of view, a revolt that yielded splendid political results, such as, in the first place, the consent to hand over the land to the peasants. It is not without reason that the Socialist-Revolutionary rabble, including Dyelo Naroda, terrified by the revolt, are now shrieking that it is necessary to hand over the land to the peasants. Here we have the correctness of Bolshevism and its success proved in practice. It has been shown to be impossible to "teach" the Bonapartists and their lackeys in the Pre-parliament anything except by revolt.

That is a fact. Facts are stubborn things. And such a factual "argument" in favour of revolt is more cogent than the thousands of "pessimistic" evasions of a confused and terrified politician.

Were the peasant revolt not an event of nation-wide political importance, the Socialist-Revolutionary lackeys in the Pre-parliament would not be shouting of the necessity of handing over the land to the peasants.

Another splendid political and revolutionary result of the peasant revolt, already mentioned in Rabochy Put, is the fact that grain is being brought to the railroad stations in the Tambov Gubernia.* Here is another "argument" for you, gentlemen who have lost your heads, an argument which proves that revolt is the only means of saving the country from the famine that is already knocking at the door and from a crisis of unprecedented dimensions. While the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik betrayers of the people are grumbling, threatening, writing resolutions and promising to feed the starving by convening a Constituent Assembly, the people will proceed to solve the grain problem in a Bolshevik way, by means of a revolt against the landlords, capitalists, and speculators.

And even the bourgeois press, even Russkaya Volya, was compelled to admit the results of this (the only true) solution of the grain problem, by reporting that the railroad stations in the Tambov Gubernia were swamped with grain. . . . After the peasants had revolted!

No, to doubt now that the majority of the people are following and will follow the Bolsheviks is shameful vacillation and in practice amounts to a renunciation of every principle of proletarian revolutionism and a complete repudiation of Bolshevism.

* * *

" . . . We are not strong enough to seize power, while the bourgeoisie is not strong enough to prevent the convocation of the Constituent Assembly. . . ."

The first part of this argument is a simple paraphrase of the preceding argument. It gains nothing in force and conviction by the fact that confusion and fear of the bourgeoisie are expressed in pessimism in relation to the workers and in optimism in relation to the bourgeoisie. When the military cadets and the Cossacks declare that they will fight the Bolsheviks to the last drop of blood, they are worthy of full credence; when, however, the workers and soldiers at hundreds of meetings express their complete confidence in the Bolsheviks and declare their readiness to fight staunchly for the transfer of power to the Soviets, it becomes "appropriate" to recall that to vote is one thing and to fight another!

Of course, if one argues in this way, then revolt is "refuted." But, one asks, how does this peculiarly aimed and peculiarly directed "pessimism" differ from political desertion to the camp of the bourgeoisie?

Look at the facts, remember the declarations repeated thousands of times by the Bolsheviks and now "forgotten" by our pessimists. We have said a thousand times that the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies are a force, that they are the vanguard of the revolution, that they are able to take power. A thousand times we have accused the Mensheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionaries of phrasemongering when they talk of the "plenipotentary organs of democracy" while at the same time they are afraid of the assumption of power by the Soviets.

And what did the Kornilov affair prove? It proved that the Soviets are indeed a force.

And now, after this has been proved by experience, by facts, we are to discard Bolshevism, repudiate ourselves, and declare that we are not strong enough (although the Soviets of both capitals and a majority of the provincial Soviets are on the side of the Bolsheviks)!!! Are not these vacillations shameful? The fact is that our "pessimists" are throwing the slogan "All power to the Soviets" overboard, but are afraid to admit it.

How can it be proved that the bourgeoisie is not strong enough to prevent the convocation of the Constituent Assembly?

If the Soviets are not strong enough to overthrow the bourgeoisie, then the bourgeoisie is strong enough to prevent the convocation of the Constituent Assembly, for there is nobody else that can prevent it from doing so. Is it worthy of a member of the proletarian party, of a revolutionary, to trust the promises of Kerensky and his associates, to trust the resolutions of the servile Pre-parliament?

Not only will the bourgeoisie be able to prevent the convocation of the Constituent Assembly if the present government is not overthrown, but it will also be able to achieve this result indirectly by surrendering Petrograd to the Germans, by opening the front, by increasing the number of lockouts, and by sabotaging deliveries of grain. Facts prove that the bourgeoisie has already done all these in part. Consequently, it is capable of doing them in full, if it is not overthrown by the workers and soldiers.

* * *

"... The Soviets must be a revolver pressed to the temple of the government with the demand that the Constituent Assembly be convened and Kornilovist attempts abandoned. . . ."

One of the two wretched pessimists went as far as to say that! And he was obliged to go as far as that because to reject insurrection is to reject the slogan "All power to the Soviets."

Of course, it need hardly be said that a slogan is "not a sacred thing." But why has nobody raised the question of changing that slogan (as I did after the July days)?¹ Why be afraid to talk about it openly, when the Party ever since September has been discussing the question of insurrection, which is now indispensable for the realisation of the slogan "All power to the Soviets"?

¹ Cf. the article "On Slogans," pp. 167-74 in this volume.—Ed.

Our wretched pessimists will never wriggle out of this. To renounce insurrection is to renounce the transfer of power to the Soviets and to "transfer" all one's hopes and expectations to the kind-hearted bourgeoisie, who have "promised" to convene the Constituent Assembly.

Is it really so difficult to understand that once the power is in the hands of the Soviets the Constituent Assembly and its success are guaranteed? The Bolsheviks have said so a thousand times. No one has ever attempted to refute it. Everybody recognised such a "combined type." But to use the term "combined type" as a shield for rejecting the transfer of power to the Soviets, to do so secretly and fear to renounce our slogan openly—what is that? Can one find a parliamentary expression to describe it?

Someone very aptly cast the retort at our pessimist: "A revolver without a bullet?" If so, this means directly siding with the Lieber-Dans,¹ who have a thousand times referred to the Soviets as a "revolver," and have a thousand times deceived the people. For when they were in control the Soviets were a mere cipher.

But if it is to be a revolver "with a bullet," this means making technical preparations for insurrection. For the bullet must be procured, the revolver must be loaded—ay, and bullets alone will not be enough.

Either one goes over to the Lieber-Dans and openly renounces the slogan "All power to the Soviets," or one is for insurrection. There is no middle course.

* * *

"... The bourgeoisie cannot surrender Petrograd to the Germans, although Rodzyanko wants to, for the fighting is being done not by the bourgeois, but by our heroic sailors. . . ."

This argument reveals the same "optimism" regarding the bourgeoisie that is being so fatally manifested at every step by the pessimists as to the revolutionary strength and ability of the proletariat.

¹ See note to p. 230.♦♦—Ed.

The fighting is being done by the heroic sailors, but this did not prevent two admirals from absconding just before the seizure of Oesel.

That is a fact. Facts are stubborn things. Facts prove that admirals are as capable of treachery as Kornilov. And it is an undisputed fact that the General Staff has not been reformed and that the commanding staff is Kornilovist.

If the Kornilovists (headed by Kerensky, for he is also a Kornilovist) want to surrender Petrograd, they can do so in two, or even three, ways.

First, by an act of treachery on the part of the Kornilovist commanding staff they can open the Northern front.

Second, they can come to an "agreement" to leave freedom of action to the German navy, which is stronger than ours; they can come to an agreement with both the German and the British imperialists. Furthermore, the "absconding admirals" may have delivered the plans to the Germans.

Third, they can by lockouts and by sabotaging the delivery of foodstuffs reduce our troops to utter impotence and despair.

Not one of these three methods can be denied. The facts prove that the bourgeois-Cossack party of Russia has already knocked at all three of these doors, that it has tried to open all of them.

What follows? It follows that we have no right to wait until the bourgeoisie strangles the revolution.

That Rodzyanko's wishes are not to be trifled with has been proved by experience. Rodzyanko is a man of action. Rodzyanko is backed by capital. That is beyond dispute. Capital is a huge force as long as the proletariat has not conquered power. Rodzyanko has been faithfully and loyally carrying out the policy of capital for decades.

What follows? It follows that to vacillate on the question of insurrection as the only way of saving the revolution is to sink to that semi-Lieber-Dan, Socialist-Revolutionary-Menshevik, pusillanimous confidence in the bourgeoisie and that "semi-muzhik," naive confidence against which the Bolsheviks have been fighting so hard.

Either fold your useless arms on your empty breast, vowing your "faith" in the Constituent Assembly, and wait until Rodzyanko and Co. surrender Petrograd and strangle the revolution, or—revolt. There is no middle course.

Even the convocation of the Constituent Assembly will in itself change nothing in this respect, for no "constitutionalism," no voting on the part of any super-sovereign assembly will have the slightest effect on the famine, or the slightest effect on Wilhelm. Both the convocation of the Constituent Assembly and its success will depend upon the transfer of power to the Soviets. This old Bolshevik truth is being more and more strikingly and brutally corroborated by the facts.

* * *

"... We are growing stronger every day; we can enter the Constituent Assembly as a strong opposition. Why should we stake everything? . . ."

This is the argument of a philistine who has "read" that the Constituent Assembly is being convened, and who trustingly confines himself to the most legal and most loyal constitutional course.

Only it is a pity that neither the problem of the famine nor the problem of the surrender of Petrograd can be solved by waiting for the Constituent Assembly. This "trifle" is forgotten by the naive, or by those who have lost their heads or who have allowed themselves to be intimidated.

The famine will not wait. The peasant revolt did not wait. The war will not wait. The absconding admirals did not wait.

Will the famine agree to wait because we Bolsheviks proclaim our faith in the convocation of the Constituent Assembly? Will the absconding admirals agree to wait? Will the Maklakovs and Rodzyankos agree to stop the lockouts, the sabotage of grain deliveries, and the secret conspiracies with the British and the German imperialists?

Yet that is what the arguments of the heroes of "constitutional illusions" and parliamentary cretinism amount to. Living realities disappear, and all that is left is a document on the convocation of the Constituent Assembly; all that is left is the elections.

And the purblind wonder that the hungry people and the soldiers who are being betrayed by the generals and admirals are indifferent to the elections! Oh, ye wiseacres!

* * *

"... If the Kornilovists start things again, we shall show them! But why should we take the risk by starting things ourselves? ..."

How extremely convincing and how extremely revolutionary! History does not repeat itself; but if we turn our backs on history, and, contemplating the first Kornilov affair, declaim: "Why, if the Kornilovists start things"—what supreme revolutionary strategy that is! How like that is to "perhaps and maybe"! Maybe the Kornilovists will start again at some inopportune time! A strong argument, is it not? A serious foundation for a proletarian policy!

But what if the Kornilovists of the second draft have learned a thing or two? What if they wait for hunger riots, for the front to be broken, for Petrograd to be surrendered, before beginning? What then?

We are invited to base the tactics of the proletarian party on the possibility of the Kornilovists repeating one of their former mistakes!

Let us forget all that has been argued and proved by the Bolsheviks hundreds of times, all that has been proved by the history of our revolution during the past half-year, namely, that there is no way out, that objectively there is not and cannot be any way out, except either in a dictatorship of the Kornilovists or in a dictatorship of the proletariat. Let us forget all this, let us renounce all this and wait! Wait for what? Wait for a miracle: namely, that the tempestuous and catastrophic course of events from May 3 (April 20) to September 11 (August 29) will be succeeded (owing to the dragging out of the war and the growing famine) by the peaceful, quiet, smooth and lawful convocation of the Constituent Assembly and by the realisation of its very lawful decisions. That is their "Marxist" tactics! Wait, ye hungry, Kerensky has promised to convoke the Constituent Assembly!

* * *

"... There is really nothing in the international situation that obliges us to act immediately; on the contrary, we shall damage the cause of the socialist revolution in the West if we allow ourselves to be shot. . . ."

A truly magnificent argument! Scheidemann himself, Renaudel himself, could not have played more cleverly on the sympathies of the workers for the international socialist revolution!

Just think of it: under devilishly difficult conditions, with but one Liebknecht (and he in prison), without newspapers, without freedom of assembly, without Soviets, with every class of the population, down to the last well-to-do peasant, incredibly hostile to the idea of internationalism, and with the imperialist big, middle, and petty bourgeoisie excellently organised—the Germans, i.e., the German revolutionary internationalists, the German workers clad in sailors' uniforms, started a mutiny in the navy, having perhaps one chance in a hundred.

But we, with our dozens of newspapers, freedom of assembly, a majority in the Soviets, we proletarian internationalists, the best-situated in the world, are to refuse to support the German revolutionaries by our revolt. We are to reason, like the Scheidemanns and Renaudels, that it would be more prudent not to revolt, for if we are shot the world will lose such splendid, such sensible, such ideal internationalists!

Let us prove how sensible we are. Let us pass a resolution of sympathy with the German insurrectionaries and renounce insurrection in Russia. That will be genuine and sensible internationalism. And how fast world internationalism would blossom forth, were the same wise policy to triumph everywhere! . . .

The workers of all countries are incredibly worn and exhausted by the war. Outbreaks in Italy, in Germany, and in Austria are becoming more and more frequent. We alone have Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies. Let us then keep on waiting. Let us betray the German internationalists as we are betraying the Russian peasants, who, not by words but by deeds, by their revolt against the landlords, are appealing to us to rise against Krensky's government. . . .

What if the clouds of imperialist conspiracy being hatched by the capitalists of all countries, who are ready to strangle the Russian revolution, are growing blacker and blacker! Let us wait calmly until we are strangled by the ruble! Instead of attacking the conspirators and breaking their ranks by a victory of the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, let us wait for the Constituent Assembly, where all international plots will be vanquished by voting, that is, provided Kerensky and Rodzyanko honestly convene the Constituent Assembly. And have we any right to doubt Kerensky's and Rodzyanko's honesty?

* * *

"... But 'everybody' is against us! We are isolated; the Central Executive Committee, the Menshevik-internationalists, the Novaya Zhiznists, and the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries have all issued and will issue manifestoes against us! . . ."

A cogent argument, indeed! Until now we mercilessly castigated the vacillators for their vacillations. By so doing we won the sympathies of the people. By so doing we won the Soviets, without which insurrection could not be reliable, rapid and certain. And now we are to use the Soviets we won in order that we too may go over to the camp of the vacillators. What a splendid career for Bolshevism!

The whole essence of the policy of the Lieber-Dans and the Chernovs, and also of the "Lefts" among the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks, is vacillation. The Left Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Menshevik-internationalists possess great political significance, inasmuch as they serve as an index that the masses are moving to the Left. The passing of some 40 per cent of both the Mensheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionaries into the camp of the Lefts on the one hand and the peasant revolt on the other are two facts which are undoubtedly and obviously connected.

But the very nature of this connection reveals the abysmal feebleness of character of those who now think fit to whine because the Central Executive Committee, which is rotting alive, and the vacillating Left Socialist-Revolutionaries and their like have come out against us. For the vacillations of the petty-bourgeois leaders—the Martovs, Kamkovs, Sukhanovs, and the rest—must be contrasted to the revolt of the peasants. Here we have a real political contrast. With whom shall we throw in our lot? With the handful of vacillating Petrograd leaders, who were an indirect expression of the Leftward movement of the masses, and who at every political turn shamefully whined and vacillated and ran to beg forgiveness of the Lieber-Dans, Avksentyevs, and so forth—or with the masses, that have moved to the Left?

That is the only way to regard the matter.

Because the peasant revolt was betrayed by the Martovs, the Kamkovs and the Sukhanovs, it is proposed that we, the workers' party of revolutionary internationalists, should also betray it. This is what the policy of "casting eyes" at the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries and Menshevik-internationalists amounts to.

But we said: In order to help the vacillating, we must stop vacillating ourselves. Those dear Left petty-bourgeois democrats even vacillated in favour of a coalition! In the end we got them to follow us by not vacillating ourselves. And the facts have vindicated us.

These gentlemen by their vacillations always ruined the revolution. It was we who saved it. And now, when famine is knocking at the gates of Petrograd, and Rodzyanko and Co. are preparing to surrender the city, are we to throw up the sponge?

* * *

"... But we have not even firm contacts with the railway workers and the postal employees. Their official representatives are the Plansons. Can we succeed without the post office and without the railways? . . ."*

Yes, yes, Plansons here, Lieber-Dans there. What confidence have the masses shown in them? Was it not we who always asserted that these leaders are betraying the masses? Was it not from these leaders that the masses turned towards us at the elections in Moscow and at the elections to the Soviets? Or are the masses of railroad and postal employees not starving? Are they not on strike against the government of Kerensky and Co.?

"Did we have contacts with these unions before March 13 (February 28)?" one comrade  asked the "pessimist." The latter replied by pointing out that the two revolutions were not comparable. But that reply only strengthens the position of the questioner. For it was the Bolsheviks who thousands of times pointed out the long preparation which a proletarian revolution against the bourgeoisie must undergo (and did so not in order that it should be forgotten on the eve of decisive action). The political and economic life of the Postal and Telegraph Employees' and the Railwaymen's Unions are marked precisely by the separation of the proletarian elements of the masses from the petty-bourgeois and bourgeois leaders. The important thing is not necessarily to secure "contacts" with any particular union beforehand; the important thing is that only a successful proletarian and peasant insurrection can satisfy the masses of the army of railwaymen and of postal and telegraph employees.

* * *

"... There is bread in Petrograd enough for only two or three days. Can we give bread to the insurrectionaries? . . ."

This is one of the thousand sceptical remarks (sceptics are always liable to "doubt," and you can refute them only by experience), the kind of remark that places the burden on the wrong shoulders.

It is Rodzyanko and Co., it is the bourgeoisie, who are in fact causing the famine and speculating on strangling the revolution with the aid of famine. There is, and can be, no escape from famine except by a revolt of the peasants against the landlords in the countryside and a victory of the workers over the capitalists in the cities and in the centre. There is no other way of getting grain from the rich, or of transporting it, despite their sabotage, or of smashing the resistance of corrupted employees and profiteering capitalists, or of establishing a strict system of accounting. This has been proved by the history of the supply organisations and of the efforts to regulate food supply on the part of the "democracy," who complained a million times of the sabotage of the capitalists, whining and imploring.

There is no power on earth that can transform complaints, supplications and tears into revolutionary action except the power of a victorious proletarian revolution. And the longer the proletarian revolution is delayed, the longer it is put off either by events or by the vacillations of the waverers and the distraught, the more victims will it cost and the more difficult will it be to organise the transportation and distribution of grain.

"In an insurrection procrastination is like unto death"—that must be our answer to those who have the deplorable "courage," in spite of the increasing economic ruin and the approach of famine, to dissuade the workers from insurrection (that is, to persuade them to wait and to continue to trust the bourgeoisie).

* * *

"... The situation at the front is not yet dangerous either. Even if the soldiers themselves conclude an armistice that will be no calamity. . ."

But the soldiers will not conclude an armistice. That requires the power of the state, and the latter cannot be secured without an insurrection. The soldiers will simply desert. This is confirmed by reports from the front. We cannot wait without the risk of aiding an agreement between Rodzyanko and Wilhelm, without the risk of complete economic ruin and the wholesale desertion of the soldiers, if they (who are already on the verge of despair) reach the point of utter despair and abandon everything to the will of fate.

* * *

"... But if we take power and do not obtain either an armistice or a democratic peace, the soldiers may refuse to fight in a revolutionary war. What then? . . ."

This argument reminds us of the proverb: One fool can ask ten times more questions than ten wise men can answer.

We have never denied the difficulties of governing during an imperialist war; nevertheless, we have always advocated a dictatorship of the proletariat and the poor peasantry. Are we then to recant now that the moment for action has arrived?

We have always said that a dictatorship of the proletariat in one country will cause gigantic changes in the international situation, in the economic life of the country, in the state of the army, and in its frame of mind. Are we to "forget" all that now and allow ourselves to be frightened by the "difficulties" of revolution?

* * *

"... As everybody reports, the masses are not in a mood that urges them on to the streets. Among the signs justifying pessimism is the extreme spread of the pogromist and Black Hundred press. . . ."

When people allow themselves to be intimidated by the bourgeoisie, all objects and all phenomena naturally assume a jaundiced hue. First, they substitute an intellectual-impressionist criterion of the movement for a Marxist criterion; subjective impressions as to moods replace a political analysis of the development of the class struggle and of the course of events in the country as a whole, in the international situation as a whole. It is, of course, "conveniently" forgotten that a firm line on the part of the Party, its unyielding resolve, is also a factor in the mood, particularly at an acute revolutionary moment. It is sometimes very "convenient" for people to forget that responsible leaders, by their vacillations and their readiness to burn the idols they worshipped yesterday, cause the most untoward vacillations in the mood of certain sections of the masses.

Secondly—and this is at present the main thing—when they talk about the mood of the masses, these spineless people forget to add:

That "everybody" reports that it is tense and expectant;

That "everybody" is agreed that, upon the first call of the Soviets, and in defence of the Soviets, the workers will rise as one man;

That "everybody" is agreed that the workers are extremely dissatisfied with the indecision of the centres on the question of the "last decisive struggle," the inevitability of which is clearly realised;

That "everybody" is unanimous in describing the mood of the broad masses of the people as bordering upon desperation and in pointing to the consequent growth of anarchism;

That "everybody" likewise recognises that there is a decided unwillingness among the class conscious workers to go on to the street only for the sake of a demonstration, or only to engage in a partial struggle, since the approach of a general struggle, and not of a partial struggle, is felt in the air, while the hopelessness of individual strikes, demonstrations, and acts of pressure has been shown by experience and is fully realised.

And so forth.

If we examine this description of the mood of the masses from the point of view of the entire development of the class and political struggle and of the entire course of events during the half-year of our revolution, it will be clearly seen how the facts are being distorted by these people who have been intimidated by the bourgeoisie. The situation is not now what it was prior to May 3-4 (April 20-21), June 22 (9), or July 16 (3); for then there was a spontaneous excitement, which we, as a party, either failed to realise, as in the case of May 3 (April 20), or tried to restrain and shape into a peaceful demonstration, as in the case of June 22 (9) and July 16 (3). For at that time we were fully aware that the Soviets were not yet ours, that the peasants still trusted the Lieber-Dan-Chernov course, and not the Bolshevik course (insurrection), and that, consequently, we could not have the majority of the people behind us, and hence insurrection was premature.

At that time the majority of class conscious workers did not even think of the last decisive struggle; and there was not a single Party body that would have raised this question. As to the less enlightened masses, and the broad masses generally, their despair was neither concentrated nor resolute; there was only a spontaneous ferment, accompanied by the naive hope of "influencing" the Kerenskys and the bourgeoisie by a mere act of demonstration.

But this is not what is needed for an insurrection; what is needed is, first, the conscious, firm and inflexible resolve of the class conscious to fight to the bitter end. Secondly, what is needed is a mood of concentrated desperation on the part of the broad masses, who feel that nothing can now be saved by half-measures; that "influencing" is out of the question; that the starving will "smash everything, destroy everything, even anarchically," if the Bolsheviks are not able to lead them in the decisive battle.

And, in fact, the development of the revolution has brought both the workers and the peasants to precisely such a combination of tense concentration as the result of experience on the part of the class conscious elements, and of hatred, bordering on desperation, towards the lockout employers and capitalists on the part of the broad masses.

And it is precisely because of this that we can understand the "success" of the scoundrels of the Black Hundred press who masquerade in the guise of Bolshevism. The Black Hundreds are maliciously jubilant over the approach of a decisive battle between the bourgeoisie and the proletariat, as has always been the case and has been observed in every revolution without exception. That is absolutely unavoidable. And if you allow yourselves to be intimidated by this circumstance, you must renounce not only insurrection, but the proletarian revolution in general. For there can be no growth of this revolution in capitalist society which is not accompanied by the malicious glee of the Black Hundreds and their hope of making a good thing for themselves out of it.

The class conscious workers know perfectly well that the Black Hundreds work hand in hand with the bourgeoisie, that a decisive victory of the workers (in which the petty bourgeois do not believe, which the capitalists fear, and which the Black Hundreds at times wish for, out of sheer malice, being convinced that the Bolsheviks cannot retain power) will utterly smash the Black Hundreds, and that the Bolsheviks will be able to retain power and retain it firmly to the great advantage of the whole of war-worn and tortured humanity.

And, indeed, is there anybody in his senses who can doubt that the Rodzyankos and Suvorins are acting in unison and that the parts have been distributed among them?

Have not the facts shown that Kerensky is acting at Rodzyanko's bidding, while the "State Printing Press of the Russian Republic" (don't laugh!) is printing at the expense of the state the Black Hundred speeches of the Black Hundreds of the "State Duma"? Has not this fact been exposed even by the lackeys on Dyelo Naroda while doing lackey service to "their man"? Has not the experience of all elections proved that the Cadet lists were fully supported by Novoye Vremya, that venal sheet, controlled by tsarist-landlord "interests"?*

Did we not read yesterday that commercial and industrial capital (non-party of course! oh, non-party, to be sure! the Vikhlyayevs and Rakitnikovs, the Gvozdevs and Nikitins are in coalition not with the Cadets—god forbid!—but with non-party commercial and industrial circles) handed out a round 300,000 rubles to the Cadets?

The whole Black Hundred press, if we regard things from a class, and not a sentimental, point of view, is a branch of the firm "Ryabushinsky, Milyukov and Co." Capital buys, on the one hand, the Milyukovs, Zaslavskys, Potresovs, and so on, and, on the other, the Black Hundreds.

There is no means of putting an end to this monstrous poisoning of the people by the virus of the Black Hundred plague, except the victory of the proletariat.

Is it to be wondered that the crowd, worn and tortured by hunger and by the dragging out of the war, so eagerly grasp at the Black Hundred poison? Can one imagine capitalist society on the eve of collapse with despair not reigning in the hearts of the oppressed masses? And could the despair of the masses, among whom there is so much ignorance, find expression otherwise than in an increased consumption of all sorts of poison?

No; the position of those who, when they talk of the mood of the masses, attribute to the masses their own spinelessness is a hopeless one. The masses are divided into those who are consciously waiting and those who in their ignorance are ready to sink into despair. But the masses of the oppressed and starving are not spineless.

* * *

"... On the other hand, the Marxist party cannot reduce insurrection to a military conspiracy..."

Marxism is an extremely profound and many-sided doctrine. It is, therefore, not surprising that scraps of quotations from Marx—especially when the quotations are not to the point—can always be found among the "arguments" of those who are breaking with Marxism. A military conspiracy is Blanquism if it is not organised by the party of a definite class; if its organisers have not reckoned with the political situation in general and the international situation in particular; if the party in question does not enjoy the sympathy of the majority of the people, as proved by definite facts; if the development of events in the revolution has not led to the virtual dissipation of the illusions of compromise entertained by the petty bourgeoisie; if the majority of the organs of revolutionary struggle which are recognised to be "authoritative" or have otherwise established themselves, such as the Soviets, have not been won over; if in the army (in time of war) sentiments hostile to a government which drags out an unjust war against the will of the people have not become fully matured; if the slogans of the insurrection (such as "All power to the Soviets," "Land to the peasants," "Immediate proposal of a democratic peace to all the belligerent peoples, coupled with the immediate abrogation of all secret treaties and secret diplomacy," etc.) have not acquired the widest renown and popularity; if the advanced workers are not convinced of the desperate situation of the masses and of the support of the countryside, as demonstrated by an energetic peasant movement, or by a revolt against the landlords and against the government that defends the landlords; if the economic situation in the country offers any real hope of a favourable solution of the crisis by peaceful and parliamentary means.

Is that enough?

In my pamphlet Can the Bolsheviks Retain State Power? (which I expect will appear in the next few days), I quote a passage from Marx which really does bear upon the question of insurrection and which defines the features which make insurrection an "art."¹

I am ready to wager that, if we were to ask those windbags who are now in Russia raising an outcry about a military conspiracy to speak up and explain the difference between the "art" of armed insurrection and a military conspiracy deserving of condemnation, they would either repeat what has been said above, or would disgrace themselves and provoke general laughter among the workers. Try it, dear also-Marxists! Sing us your little song against "military conspiracy"!

¹ See pp. 291-92 in the present volume.—Ed

POSTSCRIPT

The above lines had already been written when at eight o'clock on Tuesday evening I received the Petrograd morning papers and found an article by Mr. V. Bazarov in Novaya Zhizn. Mr. V. Bazarov asserts that "a handwritten leaflet was circulated in the city, which in the name of two prominent Bolsheviks declared against action."*

If this is true, I beg the comrades, whom this letter cannot reach earlier than Wednesday noon, to publish it as early as possible.

It was not written for the press, but as an interchange of opinions with the members of our Party by correspondence. But if the heroes of Novaya Zhizn, who do not belong to the Party and who have been ridiculed by it a hundred times for their contemptible feebleness of will (who the day before yesterday voted for the Bolsheviks, yesterday for the Mensheviks, and who almost united them at the world-famous Unity Congress ), if such individuals receive a leaflet from members of our Party agitating against insurrection, we cannot remain silent. We must agitate for insurrection. Let the anonymous individuals come out openly into the light of day and bear the punishment they deserve for their shameful vacillations—be it only the ridicule of every class-conscious worker. I have only one hour at my disposal before dispatching the present letter to Petrograd, and I will therefore only in a word or two point out one "method" resorted to by the wretched heroes of witless Novaya Zhizn-ism. Mr. V. Bazarov attempts to argue with Comrade Ryazanov, who said, and was a thousand times right in saying, that "insurrection is being prepared by those who are creating a mood of despair and indifference among the masses."

The wretched hero of a wretched cause rejoins: "Have despair and indifference ever triumphed?"

Oh, contemptible fools of Novaya Zhizn! Do they know of examples of revolt in history when the masses of the oppressed classes were victorious in desperate fight without having first been reduced to a state of desperation by protracted suffering and by the extreme aggravation of crises of all kinds; when those masses were not overcome by indifference towards various servile Pre-parliaments, towards idle playing at revolution, towards the degradation of the Soviets by the Lieber-Dans from organs of power and insurrection to the role of empty talkshops?

Or perhaps the contemptible fools of Novaya Zhizn have discovered that the masses are indifferent to the questions of bread, the dragging out of the war, and land for the peasants?

October 29-30 (16-17), 1917

A LETTER TO THE MEMBERS OF THE BOLSHEVIK PARTY ¹

COMRADES,

I have not yet been able to receive the Petrograd papers for Wednesday, October 31 (18). When the full text of Kamenev's and Zinoviev's declaration, published in Novaya Zhizn, which is not a Party paper, was transmitted to me by telephone, I refused to believe it. But doubt proved to be out of the question, and I am obliged to take this opportunity in order that this letter may reach the members of the Party by Thursday evening or Friday morning, for to remain silent in the face of such unheard-of strike-breaking would be a crime.

The more serious the practical problem, and the more responsible and "prominent" the persons guilty of strike-breaking, the more dangerous it is, the more resolutely must the strike-breakers be thrown out, and the more unpardonable would it be to hesitate even in consideration of the past "services" of the strike-breakers.

Just think of it! It is known in Party circles that the Party since September has been discussing the question of insurrection. Nobody has ever heard of a single letter or leaflet written by either of the persons named! Now, on the eve, one might say, of the Congress of Soviets, two prominent Bolsheviks come out against the majority, and, obviously, against the Central Committee. That is not stated directly, but the harm done to the cause is all the greater, for to speak in hints is even more dangerous.

It is perfectly clear from the text of Kamenev's and Zinoviev's declaration that they have gone against the Central Committee, for otherwise their declaration would be meaningless. But it is not stated what specific decision of the Central Committee they are disputing.

Why?

¹ See note to p. 304.*—Ed.

The reason is obvious: because it has not been published by the Central Committee.

What does this amount to?

On a burning question of supreme importance, on the eve of the critical day of November 2 (October 20), and in the non-Party press, indeed, in a paper which on this question is hand in glove with the bourgeoisie against the workers' party, two "prominent" Bolsheviks attack an unpublished decision of the Party centre!

Why, this is a thousand times more despicable and a million times more harmful than all the utterances Plekhanov made in the non-Party press in 1906-07, which the Party so sharply condemned.* For at that time it was only a question of elections, while now it is a question of an insurrection for the conquest of power!

And on such a question, after a decision has been taken by the centre, to dispute this unpublished decision before the Rodzyankos and Kerenskys in a non-Party paper—can one imagine anything more treacherous, a more heinous act of strike-breaking?

I should consider it disgraceful on my part if I were to hesitate to condemn these former comrades because of my former close relations with them. I declare outright that I no longer consider either of them comrades and that I will fight with all my might, both in the Central Committee and at the Congress, to secure their expulsion from the Party.

For a workers' party, which the facts of the situation are confronting more and more frequently with the necessity for insurrection, cannot accomplish that difficult task if unpublished decisions of the centre, after their adoption, are to be disputed in the non-Party press, and vacillation and confusion brought into the ranks of the fighters.

Let Messrs. Zinoviev and Kamenev found their own party from the dozens of disoriented people, or from the candidates to the Constituent Assembly. The workers will not join such a party, for its first slogan will be:

"Members of the Central Committee who are defeated at a meeting of the Central Committee on the question of a decisive fight are permitted to resort to the non-Party press for the purpose of attacking the unpublished decisions of the Party."

Let them build themselves such a party; our workers' Bolshevik Party will only gain thereby.

When all the documents are published, the strike-breaking activities of Zinoviev and Kamenev will stand out still more glaringly. In the meantime, let the following question engage the attention of the workers:

Let us assume that the Executive Committee of an all-Russian trade union had decided, after a month's deliberation and by a majority of over 80 per cent, that preparations must be made for a strike, but that for the time being the date or any other details should not be divulged. Let us assume that after the decision had been taken two members, under the false pretext of a "dissenting opinion," not only began to write to the local groups urging a reconsideration of the decision, but also permitted their letters to be communicated to newspapers of other parties. Let us, finally, assume that they themselves attacked the decision in papers of other parties, although it had not yet been published, and began to denounce the strike to the capitalists.

We ask, would the workers hesitate in expelling such strike-breakers from their midst?

* * *

As to the question of insurrection now, when November 2 (October 20) is so close at hand, I cannot from afar judge to what extent the cause has been damaged by the strike-breaking declaration in the non-Party press. There is no doubt that very great practical damage has been done. In order to remedy the situation, it is first necessary to restore unity to the Bolshevik front by expelling the strike-breakers.

The weakness of the ideological arguments against insurrection will become the clearer, the more we drag them into the light. I recently sent an article on this question to Rabochy Put, and if the editors do not find it possible to print it, members of the Party will probably acquaint themselves with it in the manuscript.¹

¹ Lenin is referring to "A Letter to the Comrades," pp. 304-24 in this volume.—Ed.

These so-called "ideological" arguments reduce themselves to two. First, that it is necessary to "wait" for the Constituent Assembly. Let us wait, maybe we can hold on until then—that is the whole argument. Maybe, despite famine, despite economic ruin, despite the fact that the patience of the soldiers is exhausted, despite Rodzyanko's measures to surrender Petrograd to the Germans (even despite the lockouts), perhaps we can hold on.

Perhaps and maybe—that is the whole point of the argument.

The second is a shrill pessimism. Everything is well with the bourgeoisie and Kerensky; everything is wrong with us. The capitalists have everything wonderfully in hand; everything is wrong with the workers. The "pessimists" are shouting at the top of their voices about the military side of the matter; and the "optimists" hold their peace, for to disclose anything to Rodzyanko and Kerensky is hardly pleasant to anybody but strike-breakers.

* * *

Difficult times. A difficult task. A serious betrayal.

Nevertheless, the problem will be solved; the workers will consolidate their ranks, and the peasant revolt and the extreme impatience of the soldiers at the front will do their work! Let us close our ranks—the proletariat must win!

N. LENIN

October 31 (18), 1917

A LETTER TO THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF THE RUSSIAN SOCIAL-DEMOCRATIC LABOUR PARTY ¹

DEAR COMRADES,

No self-respecting party can tolerate strike-breaking and strike-breakers in its midst. That is obvious. The more we reflect upon Zinoviev's and Kamenev's utterance in the non-Party press, the more certain it becomes that their action is strike-breaking in the full meaning of the term. The evasion resorted to by Kamenev at the meeting of the Petrograd Soviet * is absolutely despicable: he is, don't you see, in full agreement with Trotsky. But is it so difficult to understand that in the face of the enemy Trotsky could not have said, he had no right to say, and should not have said more than he did? Is it so difficult to understand that it is the duty of a party which is concealing its decision from the enemy (as to the necessity for an armed insurrection, the fact that it is fully ripe, that exhaustive preparations are being made for it, etc.)—and that this decision makes it binding—in public utterances to fasten not only the blame, but also the initiative upon the adversary? Only a child could fail to understand that. Kamenev's evasion is a sheer fraud. The same must be said of Zinoviev's evasion; at least of his letter of "justification" (published, I think, in the central organ), which is the only document I have seen (for, as to a dissenting opinion, an alleged dissenting opinion, which has been trumpeted in the bourgeois press, I, a member of the Central Committee, have to this very day seen nothing of it). Among Zinoviev's "arguments" there is this: Lenin, he says, sent out his letters "before any decisions were adopted," and you did not protest. That is literally what Zinoviev wrote, himself underscoring the word before four times. Is it really so difficult to understand that before a decision has been taken on the question of a strike by the centre, it is permissible to agitate for and against it; but that after a decision in favour of a strike has been taken (with the added decision to conceal the fact from the enemy), to carry on agitation against the strike is strike-breaking? Every worker will understand that. The question of armed insurrection has been discussed in the centre since September. That is when Zinoviev and Kamenev could and should have come out in writing, and then everybody, upon seeing their arguments, would have realised that they had completely lost their heads. To conceal one's views from the Party for a whole month before a decision is taken, and to send out a dissenting opinion after a decision is taken—that is to be a strike-breaker.

¹ See note to p. 304.*—Ed.

Zinoviev pretends not to understand this difference; he pretends not to understand that after a decision to strike has been taken, a decision of the centre, only strike-breakers can carry on agitation among the lower bodies against that decision. Every worker will understand that.

And that is just what Zinoviev did; he agitated against and strove to secure the defeat of the decision of the centre, both at Sunday's meeting, where he and Kamenev secured not a single supporting vote, and in his present letter. For Zinoviev has the effrontery to assert that "the opinion of the Party has not been canvassed" and that such questions "cannot be decided by ten men." Just think! Every member of the Central Committee knows that more than ten members of the Central Committee were present at the decisive meeting, that a majority of the plenum were present, that Kamenev himself declared at the meeting that "this meeting is decisive," that as to the absent members of the Central Committee it was known with absolute certainty that the majority of them were not in agreement with Zinoviev and Kamenev. And now, after the Central Committee has adopted a decision at a meeting which Kamenev himself admitted to be decisive, a member of the Central Committee has the audacity to write that "the opinion of the Party has not been canvassed," and that such questions "cannot be decided by ten men." That is strike-breaking in the full sense of the term. Between Party congresses, the Central Committee decides. The Central Committee has decided. Kamenev and Zinoviev, who before the decision was taken did not come out in writing, disputed the decision of the Central Committee after it was taken.

That is strike-breaking in the full sense of the term. After a decision has been taken, no questioning of that decision can be tolerated, particularly when it concerns immediate and secret preparations for a strike. Now Zinoviev has the insolence to blame us for "warning the enemy." Is there any limit to his brazenness? Who is it that has ruined the cause, frustrated the strike by "warning the enemy," if not those who came out on the subject in the non-Party press?

How can one attack a "decisive" resolution of the Party in a paper which on this question is hand in glove with the bourgeoisie? If that is tolerated, the Party will become impossible, the Party will be destroyed.

To call that which Bazarov learns about and publishes in a non-Party paper a "dissenting opinion" is to mock at the Party.

Kamenev's and Zinoviev's outbreak in the non-Party press was despicable for the added reason that the Party was not in a position to refute their slandorous lie openly. I know of no decisions regarding the date, Kamenev writes and publishes in his own name and in the name of Zinoviev (after such a statement, Zinoviev bears full responsibility for Kamenev's conduct and utterances).

How can the Central Committee refute that?

We cannot tell the capitalists the truth, namely, that we have decided on a strike and have decided to conceal the moment chosen for it.

We cannot refute the slanderous lie of Zinoviev and Kamenev without doing still greater damage to the cause. And therein lies the utter baseness, the real treachery of these two individuals; they have revealed the strikers' plan to the capitalists, and since we remain silent in the press everybody will guess how things stand.

Kamenev and Zinoviev have betrayed to Rodzyanko and Kerensky the decision of the Central Committee of their Party on armed insurrection and the fact that preparations for armed insurrection and the date appointed for the armed insurrection were being concealed from the enemy. That is a fact. No evasions can refute that fact. Two members of the Central Committee have by a slanderous lie betrayed the decision of the workers to the capitalists. There can, and must, be only one answer to that: an immediate decision of the Central Committee in the following terms:

“Regarding Zinoviev’s and Kamenev’s utterance in the non-Party press as strike-breaking in the full sense of the term, the Central Committee expels both of them from the Party.”

It is not easy for me to write thus about former close comrades; but I should regard any hesitation in this respect as a crime, for a party of revolutionaries which did not punish prominent strike-breakers would perish.

The question of armed insurrection, even if the strike-breakers have now delayed it for a long time by betraying it to Rodzyanko and Kerensky, has not been removed from the agenda by the Party. But how can we prepare ourselves for armed insurrection and lay plans for it, if we tolerate “prominent” strike-breakers in our midst? The more prominent a man is, the more dangerous he is, and the less deserving he is of “forgiveness,” the French say. Only your close associate can betray you.

The more “prominent” the strike-breakers are, the more imperative it is to punish them by immediate expulsion.

That is the only way to restore the workers’ party to health, to rid ourselves of a dozen or so spineless intellectuals, to rally the ranks of the revolutionaries, to go forth to meet great and momentous difficulties and to march hand in hand with the revolutionary workers.

We cannot publish the truth, namely, that after the decisive meeting of the Central Committee, Zinoviev and Kamenev at Sunday’s meeting had the audacity to demand a revision; that Kamenev had the effrontery to call out: “The Central Committee has suffered defeat, for it has done nothing for a whole week” (I could not refute that because to say what really had been done was impossible), while Zinoviev with an air of innocence proposed this resolution, which was rejected by the meeting; “No action shall be taken before consulting with the Bolsheviks who are to arrive on November 2 (October 20) for the Congress of Soviets."

Just think! After the centre has taken a decision to call a strike, it is proposed at a meeting of the rank and file that it be postponed (until November 2 [October 20], when the Congress was to convene. The Congress was subsequently postponed . . . the Zinovievs trust the Lieber-Dans!) and be referred to a body which does not know the Party rules, which has no authority over the Central Committee, and which does not know Petrograd.

And after this Zinoviev still has the insolence to write: "This is hardly the way to strengthen the unity of the Party."

What else can you call it but a threat of a split?

My answer to this threat is that I will go the limit, I will win freedom of speech for myself before the workers, and I will, at whatever cost, brand the strike-breaker Zinoviev as a strike-breaker. My answer to the threat of a split is to declare a fight to a finish, a fight for the expulsion of both strike-breakers from the Party.

The executive committee of a trade union, after a month of deliberation, decides that a strike is unavoidable, that the time is ripe, but that the date is to be concealed from the employers. After that, two members of the executive committee appeal to the rank and file, disputing the decision, and are defeated. Thereupon these two come out in the press and with the help of a slanderous lie betray the decision of the executive committee to the capitalists, thus more than half defeating the strike, or delaying it to a less favourable time by warning the enemy.

Here we have strike-breaking in the full sense of the term. And that is why I demand the expulsion of both the strike-breakers, reserving the right (in view of their threat of a split) to publish everything when publication becomes possible.

November 1 (October 19), 1917

A LETTER TO THE MEMBERS OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE*

COMRADES,

I am writing these lines on the evening of November 6 (October 24). The situation is critical in the extreme. It is absolutely clear that to delay the insurrection now will veritably be fatal.

I exhort my comrades with all my heart and strength to realise that everything now hangs on a thread; that we are being confronted by problems that can be solved not by conferences or congresses (even Congresses of Soviets), but exclusively by the people, by the masses, by the struggle of the armed masses.

The bourgeois onslaught of the Kornilovists and the removal of Verkhovsky show that we must not wait. We must at all costs, this very evening, this very night, arrest the government, first disarming (defeating, if they offer resistance) the Junkers and so forth.

We must not wait! We may lose everything!

The gain from the seizure of power immediately will be that the people (not the Congress, but the people, the army and the peasants in the first place) will be defended from the Kornilovist government, which has driven out Verkhovsky and has hatched a second Kornilov plot.

Who must take power?

At present that is not important. Let the Revolutionary Military Committee take it, or "some other institution," declaring that it will relinquish the power only to the true representatives of the interests of the people, the interests of the army (immediate proposals for peace), the interests of the peasants (the land to be taken immediately and private property abolished), the interests of the starving.

All boroughs, all regiments, all forces must be mobilised immediately and must send their delegations to the Revolutionary Military Committee and to the Central Committee of the Bolsheviks with the insistent demand that under no circumstances shall the power be left in the hands of Kerensky and Co. until November 7 (October 25); not under any circumstances; the matter must be decided unconditionally this very evening, or this very night.

History will not forgive revolutionaries for procrastinating when they can be victorious today (will certainly be victorious today), while they risk losing much, in fact, everything, tomorrow.

If we seize power today, we seize it not in opposition to the Soviets but on their behalf.

The seizure of power is a matter of insurrection; its political purpose will be clear after the seizure.

It would be a disaster, or a sheer formality, to await the wavering vote of November 7 (October 25). The people have the right and the duty to decide such questions not by a vote, but by force; in critical moments of revolution, the people have the right and the duty to give directions to their representatives, even their best representatives, and not to wait for them.

This is proved by the history of all revolutions; and it would be an infinite crime on the part of the revolutionaries were they to let the moment pass, knowing that upon them depends the salvation of the revolution, the proposal of peace, the saving of Petrograd, salvation from famine, the transfer of the land to the peasants.

The government is wavering. It must be destroyed at all costs! To delay action will be fatal.

November 6 (October 24), 1917

PART IV

THE PARTY AND THE PEASANTRY ON THE ROAD TO OCTOBER

REPORT ON THE AGRARIAN QUESTION*

*Delivered at the April All-Russian Conference of the R.S.D.L.P.,
May 11 (April 28), 1917*

COMRADES, the agrarian question was discussed by our Party so thoroughly during the first revolution ¹ that by this time, I think, our ideas on the subject are pretty well defined, an indirect proof of which is the fact that the commission of the Conference, which is composed of comrades who are fully versed in and have studied this subject, came to a unanimous agreement on the proposed draft of the resolution and introduced no radical amendments. I shall therefore confine myself to a few very brief remarks. Since all the members are in possession of the draft, in the form of proof sheets, there is no necessity to read it in full.

The present growth of the agrarian movement all over Russia is an obvious and undeniable fact. The programme of our Party, adopted by the Stockholm Congress in 1906, upon the proposal of the Mensheviks, was refuted even by the course of the first Russian revolution. At that Congress the Mensheviks carried through their programme of municipalisation, the essence of which was as follows: the peasant lands, both communal and homestead, were to remain the property of the peasants, whereas the landlords' estates were to be taken over from their owners by the local government bodies. One of the main arguments of the Mensheviks in favour of this programme was that the peasants would never understand the transfer of peasant lands to anyone but the peasants. He who has studied the minutes of the Stockholm Congress will recall that this argument was particularly stressed by Maslov, who reported on the question, and Kostrov. It must not be forgotten—as is often done nowadays—that this was before the First

¹ I.e., the Russian Revolution of 1905-07.—Ed.

Duma, when there were still no concrete facts indicative of the character of the peasant movement and its strength. Everybody knew that Russia was in the fire of an agrarian revolution, but nobody knew how the agrarian movement would be organised, or under what slogans the peasant revolution would develop. There was no way of ascertaining to what extent that Congress represented the true, practical views of the peasants themselves. The arguments of the Mensheviks consequently carried a certain weight with many of the delegates. Shortly after our Stockholm Congress we received the first substantial indications as to how the peasant masses regarded this question. In both the First and the Second Dumas the peasants themselves introduced the "Bill of the 104." * I made a special study of the signatories of this bill, I carefully familiarised myself with the opinions of the deputies, ascertained to what class they belonged and to what extent they could be called peasants. And in my book, which was burnt by the tsarist censorship, but which I shall nevertheless republish, I stated categorically that of the one hundred and four signatures the overwhelming majority are signatures of real peasants. That bill demanded the nationalisation of the land. The peasants wanted all land to be made the property of the state.

How, then, are we to explain the fact that in the Dumas, twice convened, the representatives of the peasantry of entire Russia preferred nationalisation to the measure proposed by the Mensheviks in both Dumas on behalf of the peasantry? The Mensheviks proposed that the peasants should retain their lands as their own property, and that only the landed estates should be transferred to the people; the peasants, on the contrary, maintained that all land should be transferred to the people. How can we account for this? The Socialist-Revolutionaries maintain that, owing to the prevalence of the "communal principle" in the villages, the Russian peasants are in sympathy with socialisation, with the labour-principle. But in all this phraseology there is not a single grain of common sense, it is all talk. As a matter of fact, the peasants came to this conclusion because the whole system of landownership in Russia, peasant and landlord, communal and homestead, was thoroughly permeated by antiquated, semi-feudal conditions; and the peasants, from the point of view of the market, were obliged to demand the transfer of the land to the whole people. The peasants claim that the tangle of the old agrarian life can be disentangled only by nationalisation. Their point of view is bourgeois; by equal land tenure they mean the confiscation of the lands of the rich landlords, but not the equalisation of individual owners. By nationalisation they mean an active redistribution of the land. This is essentially a bourgeois project. Not one of the peasants mentioned equalisation, or socialisation, but what they all asserted was that it was impossible to wait any longer, that the land had to be "unenclosed"—in other words, that under twentieth century conditions it was impossible to retain the old forms of agriculture. There must not be varying forms of land-ownership. In this there is not the slightest suggestion of socialisation. This demand of the peasants is called equalisation because, as a brief summary of the statistics relating to land possession in 1905 shows, one landlord family held as much land as 300 peasant families, viz., 2,000 dessiatins. In that sense it is, of course, equalisation, but it does not follow that the intention is to equalise the small peasant holdings. The Bill of the 104 indicates the very opposite.

That is the chief thing that must be said in scientific justification of the opinion that, from the bourgeois-democratic standpoint, nationalisation in Russia is essential. But it is essential also for the reason that it will be a powerful blow to private ownership in the means of production. To imagine that upon the abolition of private property in land everything in Russia will remain as of old is simply absurd.

The draft resolution goes on to draw practical conclusions and demands. Of the minor amendments, I shall mention the following: In point 1 of the resolution it is stated: "The party of the proletariat will with all its might support the immediate and entire confiscation of all landed estates. . . ." Instead of "support" we ought to say "fight for." Our view is not that the peasants have not enough land and that they need more. That is the stock opinion. We say that the landed estates are the basis of the oppression that is stifling the peasantry and retarding its development. The question is not whether the peasants have too little land or not. Down with feudal oppression!—that is the way to put the matter from the standpoint of the revolutionary class struggle, although not from the standpoint of those bureaucrats who argue about how much land there is available and according to what standards it should be distributed. I propose to reverse the order of points 2 and 3, because the important thing for us is revolutionary initiative, of which the law must be the result. If you wait until a law is written, and do not yourselves develop revolutionary energy, you will have neither law nor land.

An objection often brought against nationalisation is that it requires a gigantic bureaucratic apparatus. That is true; but state ownership implies that every peasant is a tenant of the state, and that the transfer of leaseholds is prohibited. The question of how much and what kind of land the peasant shall lease is one entirely for settlement by a proper democratic, and not bureaucratic, body.

For “farm hands”¹ we substitute “agricultural workers.” Several comrades maintain that the word batrak is offensive; objections have been raised to this word. It should be removed.

We cannot now speak of proletarian-peasant committees or Soviets for the settlement of the land question, for, as we see, the peasants have created Soviets of Soldiers’ Deputies, and thus a differentiation between the proletariat and the peasantry has already been made.

As we know, the petty-bourgeois defencist parties² want to have the settlement of the land question postponed until the Constituent Assembly meets.* We are for the immediate transfer of the land to the peasants, and for this being effected in the most organised manner possible. We are absolutely opposed to anarchistic seizures. You² propose that the peasants should enter into agreements with the landlords. We say that the land should be taken over immediately and sown, in order to avert famine and in order to save the country from the crash which is moving on us with such fearful rapidity. One cannot now accept the prescriptions of Shingarev and the Cadets,* who are proposing that we wait for the Constituent Assembly, the date of which is unknown, or that agreements be entered into with the landlords for the lease of the land. The peasants are already seizing the land without compensation, or paying only one-quarter of the rent.

¹ In Russian batrak.—Ed. Eng. ed.

² I.e., the Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries.—Ed.

One comrade has brought a local resolution from the Penza Gubernia,¹ in which it is stated that the peasants are seizing the farm implements of the landlords, which however they are not dividing among the individual households, but are turning into public property. They are establishing a definite rotation and definite rules so as to cultivate the whole of the land with these implements. In resorting to such measures, they are guided by the desire to improve the methods of agricultural production. This fact is of tremendous and fundamental significance, despite the landlords and the capitalists, who are howling that this is anarchy. If you keep talking and howling that this is anarchy, and the peasants keep waiting, there will indeed be anarchy. The peasants are proving that they understand the economic conditions and public control better than the officials, and are applying it a hundred times more efficiently. Such a measure, easily realisable in a small village, will serve as an inevitable stimulus to more sweeping measures. If the peasant learns this—and he has begun to learn it—the knowledge of bourgeois professors will not be needed; he will himself come to the conclusion that it is essential that agricultural implements be utilised not only by small farms but also for the cultivation of the entire land. How they will do that is not important; whether they will combine their individual plots for common ploughing and sowing we do not know; and it does not matter if they do it in different ways. What does matter is that, fortunately, they are not faced with that large-number of petty-bourgeois intellectuals who style themselves Marxists and Social-Democrats, and who with important mien are advising the people that the time is not yet ripe for a socialist revolution, and that therefore the peasants must not take the land. Fortunately, there are very few such gentlemen in the Russian villages. If the peasants contented themselves merely with taking the land on the basis of agreements with the landlords, but neglected to apply their experience collectively, failure would be inevitable; and the peasant committees would then become mere puppets, the game would end in a stalemate. That is why we propose to add point 8 to the resolution.

¹ See note to p. 363.*—Ed.

Since we know that the local peasants have themselves taken the initiative, it is our duty and obligation to declare that we support and recommend such initiative. That is the only guarantee that the revolution will not be limited to measures of a formal character, that the struggle against the crisis will not remain a mere subject for departmental discussion and for Shingarev epistles, but that the peasants will actually proceed in an organised way to fight famine and to increase output.

RESOLUTION ON THE AGRARIAN QUESTION ¹

Adopted by the April All-Russian Conference of the R.S.D.L.P.

THE existence of the landed estates in Russia is the material stronghold of the power of the feudal landlords and is a pledge of the possibility of the restoration of the monarchy. This form of landownership inevitably condemns the overwhelming mass of the population of Russia, the peasantry, to poverty, bondage and oppression, and the entire country to backwardness in every sphere of life.

Peasant landownership in Russia, both as regards allotted land (communal and homestead) and private land (leased or purchased), is enmeshed from top to bottom, and all around, by old semi-feudal ties and relationships, e.g., the division of the peasants into categories inherited from the time of serfdom, the system of divided holdings, and so forth. The necessity of breaking down these antiquated and injurious partitions, of "unenclosing" the land, and of reconstructing the system of landownership and agriculture so as to bring them into harmony with the new conditions of Russian and world economy, forms the material basis for the desire of the peasantry for the nationalisation of all the land in the state.

No matter in what petty-bourgeois utopias all Narodnik parties and groups envelop the struggle of the peasant masses against the feudal landed estates and against the feudal fetters which enmesh landownership and land tenure in Russia generally—in itself that struggle represents a bourgeois-democratic, an undoubtedly progressive, and an economically essential endeavour to break those fetters.

Nationalisation of the land, while it is a bourgeois measure, provides the greatest amount of freedom for the class struggle and the greatest exemption of land tenure from non-bourgeois features conceivable in a capitalist society. Moreover, nationalisation of the land, representing as it does the abolition of private property in land, would in practice deal such a severe blow to private property in all means of production in general that the Party of the proletariat must assist such a reform in every possible way.

¹ See note to p. 339.*—Ed.

On the other hand, the well-to-do peasants of Russia have long ago produced the elements of a peasant bourgeoisie, and the Stolypin agrarian reform* has undoubtedly strengthened, multiplied and fortified these elements. At the other pole of the village, the agricultural wage workers, the proletarians and the mass of semi-proletarian peasantry who are not far removed from proletarians, have likewise become strengthened and multiplied.

The more decided and consistent the break-up and elimination of the landed estates and the more decided and consistent the bourgeois-democratic agrarian reform in Russia in general, the more vigorous and speedy will be the development of the class struggle of the agricultural proletariat against the rich peasantry (the peasant bourgeoisie).

It will depend on whether the urban proletariat succeeds in securing the following of the rural proletariat, together with the mass of rural semi-proletarians, or whether this mass follows the peasant bourgeoisie, which is inclining towards union with the Guchkovs and Milyukovs, with the capitalists and landlords and the counter-revolution in general—as to how the fate and issue of the Russian revolution will be determined, if the incipient proletarian revolution in Europe does not exercise a direct and powerful influence on our country.

In view of this class situation and this relation of forces, the Conference resolves that:

- 1) The Party of the proletariat will fight with all its might for the immediate and entire confiscation of all landed estates in Russia (and also appanage lands, church lands, tsar's lands, etc.);

2) The Party will vigorously advocate the immediate transfer of all lands to the peasantry organised into Soviets of Peasants' Deputies, or into other organs of local government, democratically elected and entirely independent of the landlords and officials;

3) The Party of the proletariat demands the nationalisation of all the land in the state; nationalisation, which signifies the transfer of the right of property in all land to the state, entrusts the right of administering the land to local democratic institutions.

4) The Party must, on the one hand, wage a determined struggle against the Provisional Government, which, both through the mouthpiece of Shingarev and by its collective utterances, is trying to induce the peasants to come to "voluntary agreements with the landlords," i.e., to impose upon them reforms which suit the interests of the landlords, and is threatening the peasants with punishment for "arrogation of power," which is a threat of violence on the part of a minority of the population (the landlords and capitalists) against the majority. On the other hand, the Party must wage a determined struggle against the petty-bourgeois vacillations of the majority of the Narodniki and the Menshevik Social-Democrats, who are advising the peasants to refrain from taking over the land pending the convocation of the Constituent Assembly;

5) The Party recommends the peasants to take over the land in an organised way, so that not the slightest damage should be done to property, and also to take measures to increase production;

6) An agrarian reform can be successful and of abiding value only provided the whole state is democratised, i.e., provided, on the one hand, that the police, the standing army and the actually privileged bureaucracy have been abolished, and, on the other, that there exists a comprehensive system of local government exempt from supervision and tutelage from above;

7) The separate and independent organisation of the agricultural proletariat must be undertaken immediately and universally, both in the form of Soviets of Agricultural Workers' Deputies (as well as of separate Soviets of deputies from the semi-proletarian peasantry),* and in the form of proletarian groups or fractions within the general Soviets of Peasants' Deputies, within all local and municipal government bodies, etc.;

8) The Party must support the initiative of those peasant committees which in a number of localities in Russia are handing over the livestock and implements of the landlords to the peasantry organised by those committees, for the purpose of their socially regulated employment in the cultivation of all the land;

9) The Party of the proletariat must advise the rural proletarians and semi-proletarians to strive to organise on all landed estates fair-sized model farms to be conducted for the public account by the Soviets of Agricultural Workers' Deputies under the direction of agricultural experts and with the application of the best machinery.

May 7-12 (April 24-29), 1917

DRAFT RESOLUTION ON THE AGRARIAN QUESTION

*Proposed to the First All-Russian Congress of Peasants' Deputies **

1) All landed estates and privately owned lands, as well as appanages, church lands, etc., must be turned over immediately to the people without compensation.

2) The peasantry must in an organised manner, through their Soviets of Peasants' Deputies, immediately take over all the lands in their localities, for the purpose of their economic exploitation, without however in any way prejudicing the final settlement of agrarian relations by the Constituent Assembly or by an All-Russian Council of Soviets, should the people decide to entrust the central power of the state to such a Council of Soviets.

3) Private property in land generally must be abolished, i.e., the ownership of the whole land shall be vested solely in the whole people, while the disposal of the land shall be entrusted to the local democratic institutions.

4) The peasants must reject the advice of the capitalists and landlords and of their Provisional Government to come to "an agreement" with the landlords in each locality as to the immediate disposal of the land; the disposal of the land must be determined by the organised will of the majority of the local peasants, and not by an agreement between the majority, i.e., the peasants, and the minority, and an insignificant minority at that, i.e., the landlords.

5) Not only the landlords are resisting, and will continue to resist with every means at their disposal, the transfer of the landed estates to the peasants without compensation, but also the capitalists, who wield tremendous monetary power and exercise great influence on the unenlightened masses through the newspapers, the numerous officials accustomed to the domination of capital, etc. Hence, the transfer without compensation of the landed estates to the peasantry cannot be effected completely or permanently unless the confidence of the peasant masses in the capitalists is undermined, unless a close alliance between the peasantry and the city workers is established, and unless the state power is completely transferred to the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers', Peasants' and other Deputies. Only a state power which is in the hands of such Soviets, and which governs the state not through a police, or a bureaucracy, or a standing army alienated from the people, but through a national, universal and armed militia of workers and peasants, can guarantee the realisation of the above-mentioned agrarian reforms, which are being demanded by the entire peasantry.

6) Agricultural wage workers and poor peasants, i.e., such as for the lack of sufficient land, cattle and implements secure their livelihood partly by selling their labour, must make every effort to organise themselves independently into separate Soviets, or into separate groups within the general Peasants' Soviets, in order that they may be in a position to defend their interests against the rich peasants, who will inevitably strive to form an alliance with the capitalists and landlords.

7) As a result of the war, Russia, like all the other belligerent countries, as well as many neutral countries, is being threatened by economic disruption, disaster and famine because of the lack of hands, coal, iron, etc. Only if the Workers' and Peasants' Deputies assume control and supervision over the production and distribution of goods can the country be saved. It is therefore necessary to proceed immediately to arrange agreements between Soviets of Peasants' Deputies and Soviets of Workers' Deputies regarding the exchange of grain and other rural products for implements, shoes, clothing, etc., without the intermediary of the capitalists, who must be removed from the management of the factories. With the same purpose in view, the peasants' committees must be encouraged to take over the livestock and implements of the landlords, such livestock and implements to be used in common. Similarly, the transformation of all large private estates into model farms must be encouraged, the land to be cultivated collectively with the aid of the best implements under the direction of agricultural experts and in accordance with the decisions of the local Soviets of Agricultural Workers' Deputies.

Beginning of June (end of May) 1917

SPEECH ON THE AGRARIAN QUESTION

Delivered at the First All-Russian Congress of Peasants' Deputies, June 4 (May 22), 1917¹

COMRADES, the resolution which I have the honour of submitting to your attention in the name of the Social-Democratic fraction of the Peasants' Soviet has been printed and distributed to the delegates. If not all have received copies, we shall see to it that an additional number are printed tomorrow for distribution to all desirous of having it.

In a short speech I can of course take up only the main, the principal problems, those which interest the peasantry and the working class most. To those who are interested in the question in greater detail I would recommend the resolution of our Party, the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party (Bolsheviks), which was published as a supplement to No. 13 of the newspaper Soldatskaya Pravda and repeatedly commented upon in our paper, Pravda. At present I shall have to limit myself to an examination of the most important, most controversial, or most misunderstood points of my resolution and of the programme of our Party on the agrarian question. One such controversial or misunderstood point is the question touched upon at yesterday's or the day before yesterday's session of the Chief Land Committee, of which you all probably heard or read in yesterday's or the day before yesterday's papers.* There was present at the session of the Chief Land Committee one of the representatives of our Party, a colleague of mine on the Central Committee, Comrade Smilga. Comrade Smilga introduced a motion at the session to the effect that the Chief Land Committee should express itself in favour of the immediate and organised seizure by the peasantry of the landed estates. Many objections against this motion were showered upon Comrade Smilga. [Voice: And here, too.] I am told that here too many comrades will oppose this motion. The more reason, therefore, why I should give an explanation of this point of our programme, for it seems to me that the greater part of the objections to our programme are based either on a misunderstanding or on a misinterpretation of our views.

¹ See note p. 349.*—Ed.

What do all the resolutions of our Party, all the articles in our organ, in our paper, Pravda, say? We say that the whole land, without exception, must become the property of the whole people. We arrived at this conclusion on the basis of a study, particularly, of the peasant movement of 1905 and the declarations of the peasant deputies in the First and Second State Dumas, where many peasant deputies from all parts of Russia could express themselves with comparative freedom—only comparative, of course.

The whole land must become the property of the whole people. From this it follows that, while we stand for the immediate transfer of the landed estates to the local peasants, without compensation, we by no means favour the seizure of these lands as private property, and in no case do we favour the partition of these lands. We say that the land must be taken for a single sowing by the local peasantry upon the decision of a majority of the local and peasant delegates. We do not advocate that the land should become the property of the peasants who are now taking it for a single sowing. All such objections to our proposal, which I have continually come across and read of in the columns of the capitalist papers, are simply based upon a false interpretation of our views. Since we declare—and I repeat we have declared it in all our resolutions—that the land must become the property of the whole people and pass to them without compensation, it is obvious that the settlement of the final distribution of the land and the final settlement of agrarian relations is a matter solely for the central state power, i.e., for the Constituent Assembly, or for the All-Russian Council of Soviets, if such a power, a Council of Soviets, were to be created by the peasant and worker masses. There are no differences of opinion on this score.

The differences of opinion begin when it is objected that, if that is the case, then the immediate transfer of the landed estates to the peasantry without compensation will be an arbitrary arrogation of power. This view, which was expressed with great precision, authority and weight by the Minister for Agriculture, Shingarev, in his well-known telegram, we consider in the highest degree erroneous and detrimental to the peasantry, detrimental to the tillers of the land, detrimental from the point of view of providing the country with bread, and unjust. I take the liberty of reading this telegram in order to show what it is we most object to:

"An independent solution of the land question in the absence of a general state law cannot be tolerated. Arrogation of power will lead to a national calamity . . . the settlement of the land question by law is a matter for the Constituent Assembly. In the meantime, Agrarian Conciliation Boards have been set up in the localities in connection with the volost Committees of Supply, consisting of tillers and owners of the land."

This is the most salient passage in the government's declaration on this question. If you acquaint yourself with the resolution adopted yesterday or the day before yesterday by the Chief Land Committee on this question, with the resolution which was also recently adopted by a conference of members of the State Duma,* you will see that both resolutions proceed from one and the same point of view. They accuse the peasants who desire the immediate transfer of the land to the local peasant committees without compensation of arrogation of power. They proceed from the view that only a voluntary agreement between the peasants and the landowners, between the tillers of the land and the owners of the land, is compatible with the general needs and interests of the state. That is what we deny, that is what we contest.

Let us analyse the objections to our proposal. The usual objections are that land in Russia is distributed very unequally, both among the various small units, such as the villages and volosts, and among the various large units, such as the gubernias and oblasts.¹ It is said that if the local population, by their own majority decision, were to take the land into their own hands without reckoning with the will of the landlords, and, furthermore, without compensation, the inequality of distribution would remain, and that there would even be danger of its perpetuation. We reply that this argument is based on a misconception. Unequal distribution of the land will remain in any case, until such time as the Constituent Assembly, or whatever the central power may be, finally establishes a new system. Pending the establishment of this system, no matter whether the question be settled as the peasant wishes or as the landlord wishes; whether it be settled as we want it, i.e., by the immediate transfer of the land to the peasants, or as the landlords want it, who are prepared to lease out the land at high rentals on condition that both the peasant tenant and the landlord retain their rights—in any case, unequal distribution will remain. This objection is obviously incorrect and unjust. We say that it is necessary as quickly as possible to create a central state power which will not only be based upon the will and decision of the majority of the peasants, but will also directly express the opinion of that majority. There is no difference of opinion on that score. When we hear the objections levelled against the Bolsheviks, the attacks upon them by the capitalist papers, the allegation that we are anarchists, we repudiate all this most categorically and regard such attacks as a dissemination of malicious lies and calumnies.

¹ Oblast—a region.—Ed. Eng. ed.

Anarchists are people who deny that a state power is necessary; whereas we say that a state power is absolutely essential; and essential not only for Russia now, but for every state, even if it were directly passing to socialism. A strong state power is absolutely essential! All we desire is that this power shall be entirely and exclusively in the hands of the majority of workers', soldiers', and peasants' deputies. That is wherein we differ from other parties. We do not deny that a strong state power is necessary; what we say, however, is that all landed estates must be transferred to the peasants without compensation, upon the decision of the local peasant committees, adopted by a majority, and on condition that no damage be done to property. This is stated in our resolution in the most explicit manner. We vigorously repudiate the objection that our view amounts to an arbitrary arrogation of power.

No, in our opinion it is an arrogation of power for the landlords to retain the land for their own benefit, or exact rent for it; but for a majority of the peasantry to declare that the landlords shall not be allowed to retain their estates, that the peasants for long decades, nay, centuries, have experienced nothing but oppression from the landlords, is not arrogation of power: that is a restoration of rights, and a restoration of rights must not be delayed. It is true that if the land passes to the peasants now, inequality between the various regions will not be eliminated. But nobody can do away with this inequality until the Constituent Assembly convenes. If we were to ask Shingarev, who objects to our views and in official documents abuses the adherents of our views for "arrogation of power," for his remedy for this inequality, he would not be able to answer. He offers no remedy, and has none to offer.

He advocates "voluntary agreements between the peasants and the landlords." What does that mean? I will cite two basic figures concerning landownership in European Russia. These figures show that at one pole of Russian rural life we have extremely rich landlords, among them the Romanovs, the richest and most pernicious of landlords, and at the other end extremely poor peasants. I will cite two figures, so that you may understand the significance of the preaching of Shingarev and of the landlords and capitalists. These are the two figures: if we take the richest landlords in European Russia, we find that the largest, who number less than 30,000, possess about 70,000,000 dessiatins of land. This amounts to an average of 2,000 dessiatins each. If we take the upper strata of rich Russian landlords, without distinction of social rank (the majority of them are nobles, but there are also others), we find they number 30,000 and own 70,000,000 dessiatins! And if we take the poor peasants, we find that, according to the same census of 1905, which offers the latest data collected throughout Russia uniformly—data which as a matter of fact do not deserve much credence, like all statistics collected under the tsar by tsarist officials, but which nevertheless provide the only figures approximating to the truth and suitable for comparative purposes—if we take the poor peasantry, we find that there are 10,000,000 households possessing altogether from 70,000,000 to 75,000,000 dessiatins. In other words, the one has over 2,000 dessiatins, whereas the other has $7\frac{1}{2}$ dessiatins per household! And still they say that it would be arrogation of power were the peasants to refuse to conclude voluntary agreements! What does “voluntary agreement” mean? It means that the land-owners will perhaps lease the land for a good rental, but will not surrender it to anybody for nothing. Is that just? No, it is not just. Is that advantageous to the peasant population? No, it is not. How ownership in land will be finally determined is a matter for the future central power to decide, but in the meantime the landed estates must pass into the hands of the peasantry by organised seizure without compensation. Minister Chernov, arguing in the Chief Land Committee against my comrade, Smilga, said that the two words “organised seizure” are mutually contradictory: for if it is seizure, it cannot be organised, and if it is organised, it cannot be seizure. I think that this criticism is incorrect. I think that if the peasantry adopt a decision by a majority in any village or volost, in any uyezd¹ or gubernia—and in some gubernias, if not in all, the peasant congresses have established a government power in the localities that represents the interests and the will of the majority, the will of the population, i.e., of the majority of the tillers of the soil—if the peasants create such a government power locally, then its decision will be the decision of the power they recognise. It will be the power for which the local peasant population cannot but entertain full respect. Let the peasant know that he is taking the landlord's land; if he pays for it, let him pay into the uyezd peasants' fund; let him know that this money will go to improve agriculture, to pave roads, lay new roads, etc. Let him know that he is taking not his own land, and not the landlord's land, but the land of the whole people, the disposal of which will finally be decided by the Constituent Assembly. That is why from the very beginning of the revolution, from the creation of the first Land Committee, the landlord must forfeit every right to the land; nor must any monetary payments be made for the land.

¹ Uyezd—an administrative unit, part of a gubernia.—Ed. Eng. ed.

The fundamental difference between us and our opponents lies in our conception of what constitutes good order and what constitutes law. Hitherto, the view was that good order and law is that which is convenient for the landlords and the officials, while we assert that good order and law is that which is convenient for the majority of the peasantry! Until there is an All-Russian Council of Soviets or a Constituent Assembly, every local authority, be it the uyezd committees or the gubernia committees, is the supreme order and law! We regard it as an arrogation of power when one landlord, on the basis of century-old privileges, can demand a "voluntary" agreement with three hundred peasant families, each of which has on the average $7\frac{1}{2}$ dessiatins of land! We say: "Let decisions be adopted by a majority; we want the peasants to get the landed estates now, without delaying a single month, a single week, or a single day!"

It is objected: "If the peasantry seize the land now, then in all likelihood it will be seized by the more prosperous, who possess cattle, implements, etc. Will that not be dangerous from the point of view of the poor peasantry?" Comrades, I must dwell on this objection because our Party, in all its decisions, programmes and manifestoes to the people declares: "We are a party of wage workers and poor peasants; we desire to safeguard their interests; through them, and through them alone, through these classes, can humanity escape the horrors into which it has been precipitated by this war of the capitalists."

That is why we are very attentive to objections which claim that our decisions do not correspond to the interests of the poor peasants, and invite particular attention towards them, because these objections go to the very heart, the very root of the matter. The point of the matter is: how can and should the interests of the wage workers of town and country, and the interests of the poor peasants, be defended in the developing revolution against the interests of the landlords and the rich peasants, who are also capitalists? This, of course, is the crux of the matter, the very essence of the matter! And it is objected that if we advise the peasants to seize the land immediately it will be seized first of all by those who possess implements and cattle, while the poor will remain empty-handed. Well, I ask you, will voluntary agreement with the landlords help?

You know perfectly well that landlords are not eager to lease their land to peasants who have not a penny to their name, and that, on the contrary, they will resort to "voluntary" agreements when they see a prospect of securing a good rental. Somehow, landlords hitherto have never given away their land for nothing; so far as I know, nobody has ever observed anything like that in Russia.

Voluntary agreements with the landlords imply that the privileged and favoured position and advantages of the rich peasants will be still more enhanced, extended and strengthened; for they are most likely to be able to pay the landlord; for the rich peasant is a solvent person in the eyes of the landlord. The landlord knows that he can pay, that the rent can be collected from him, and therefore in such "voluntary" deals with the landlords the rich peasants have certainly more to gain than the poor peasants. On the contrary, if there is any way of helping the poor peasant at once, it is only by the measure I propose, namely, that the land should be immediately handed over to the peasants without compensation.

Landed proprietorship has always been and always will be a supreme injustice. The possession of the land by the peasants without compensation, if it is done by a majority, will be not an arbitrary arrogation of power, but a restoration of a right. That is how we regard the matter, and that is why we regard as a great injustice the argument that the poor peasant will suffer. It is called a "voluntary" agreement, it requires a Shingarev to call it a "voluntary" agreement when one landlord possesses 2,000 dessiatins, while three hundred peasants on an average possess $7\frac{1}{2}$ dessiatins each. To call such an agreement voluntary is to mock at the peasant. It is not a voluntary agreement, but a compulsory agreement for the peasant, and will be compulsory until such time as every volost, gubernia, uyezd and All-Russian Peasant Soviet declares that the private property of the landlord is a supreme injustice, the abolition of which must not be deferred a single hour or a single minute.

Property in land must belong to the whole people, and its establishment is the task of the central state government. As long as that government has not assembled, the local authorities, I repeat, must take over the landed estates, and this they must do by a majority decision and in an organised way. It is not true that disorder reigns in Russia, as the papers assert! It is not true: in the villages greater order now prevails than was the case before, for decisions are being arrived at by a majority vote; there has been practically no violence committed against the landlords; cases of injustice and violence against the landlords are extremely rare; in fact, their number is insignificant, and, taking Russia as a whole, hardly exceeds the number of cases of violence that have always occurred.

Let me now touch upon another argument which I have had occasion to hear and which I examined in our paper, Pravda, in connection with the question of the immediate transfer of the land to the peasantry.¹

The argument is that if the peasant is advised to take over the landed estates immediately and without compensation, the result will be dissatisfaction, irritation, suspicion and even resentment among the soldiers at the front, who may say: "If the peasants take the land now, while we are at the front, we shall be left without land." The soldiers might quit the front, and chaos and anarchy would ensue. To which we reply that this objection has nothing to do with the main question; for in either case, whether the land is taken for payment by agreement with the landlords, or by a decision of a majority of the peasantry, the soldiers will remain at the front as long as the war lasts; of course they will remain at the front and cannot return to their villages. Why should the soldiers at the front not fear that the landlords, under the guise of a voluntary agreement, may impose unfavourable conditions, and why should they fear what the peasantry decide by a majority vote against the landlords? Incomprehensible! Why do you think that the soldier at the front will have confidence in the landlord and in a "voluntary" agreement with the landlord? I can understand this being said by the landlord and capitalist parties, but that this should be the view of the Russian soldier at the front I cannot believe. If there is to be a "voluntary" agreement with the landlord, the soldier will not regard that as good order, he will have no confidence in it; he will rather be inclined to think that the old disorder of landlord rule is continuing.

¹ In the article entitled "On the 'Unauthorised Seizure' of Land," which appeared in Pravda of June 2 (May 20), 1917 (Lenin, Collected Works, Vol. XX).—Ed.

The soldier will have more confidence if he is told that the land is being transferred to the people, that the local peasants will rent it and will not pay the landlord, but will pay their contributions to their committee, to be used for the common welfare and for the benefit of the soldier at the front, and not to the landlord. If this is decided by a majority, the soldier at the front will know that there will be no more "voluntary" agreements with the landlords, but that the landlords are citizens with the same rights as others, and that nobody wishes to injure them. The land will belong to the whole people: that means that it will belong also to the landlord; not, however, on the basis of the privileges of nobility, but in the same way as it belongs to every citizen. There must be no privileges for the landowners from the day of the overthrow of the power of the tsar, who was the largest landlord and oppressor of the masses. From the moment freedom was established the power of the landlords must be regarded as overthrown once and for all. The soldier at the front will lose nothing from this point of view; on the contrary, he will have greater confidence in the state power and a calm assurance for the fate of his home, knowing that his family will not be allowed to suffer, nor will they remain uncared for.

There remains one more argument that is levelled against our proposal. The argument is that if the peasants were to seize the landlords' estates immediately the result of a seizure effected so precipitately and with so little preparation might be that the tillage and sowing of the land might suffer. I must say that the power of the majority, a central state power, has not yet been created; the peasants have not yet acquired sufficient confidence in themselves, and have not yet lost confidence in the landlords and capitalists. I think that we are approaching nearer to this every day, that every day the peasants are losing confidence in the old state power and are beginning to realise that the government in Russia must consist of the elected deputies of the peasants, soldiers and workers, and nobody else. I think that we are approaching nearer to this every day not because certain parties are advising it; for millions of people will never hearken to the advice of parties if that advice does not coincide with what they are learning from their own experience. We are rapidly approaching the time when there will be no power in Russia except that of the elected deputies of the peasants and workers. And when I am told that the immediate seizure of the land may lead to poor cultivation, to poor sowing, I must admit that our peasant, owing to his downtrodden condition and the age-long oppression of the landlords, cultivates his land very poorly. Of course, a terrible crisis is reigning in Russia, as in all the belligerent countries; and there can be no salvation for Russia unless the land is better cultivated and the greatest economy in human labour is observed. But can "voluntary" agreements with the landlords change anything now, in this first sowing? Why, will the landlords see to it that the land is better cultivated, or will the peasants sow the land worse if they know that they are sowing not the landlord's land but the land of the whole people, that they are not paying the landlord, but are paying into their own peasants' funds? That is such nonsense that I am always astonished to hear such arguments. It is utterly incredible and is nothing but a ruse on the part of the landlords.

The landlords have come to understand that they cannot rule by the whip any longer. They understand that very well now and are adopting a method of ruling which is a novelty for Russia, but which has long existed in Western Europe. That it is impossible to rule by the whip any longer has been shown in our country by two revolutions, whereas in Western Europe it has been shown by dozens of revolutions. These revolutions serve as lessons to the landlords and capitalists; they teach them that the people must be ruled by deceit and flattery; they teach them that they must adapt themselves, attach a red badge to their coats, and, although they may be parasites, declare: "We are revolutionary democrats; just wait a little, please, and we shall do everything for you." To argue that the peasants will sow their land worse if they sow not the landlords' but the people's land is to make game of the peasants and is an attempt to retain domination over them by fraud.

I repeat, there must be no landed estates at all. Possession is not necessarily ownership; possession is a temporary measure and changes from year to year. A peasant who rents a piece of land will not dare to regard it as his own. The land is not his and not the landlord's, but the people's. I repeat, the sowing of the fields this year, this spring, cannot suffer because of this fact. The suggestion is so monstrous, so incredible, that all I can say is this: Beware of the landlords, do not trust them, do not allow yourselves to be deceived by cajoling and promises. Remember that a decision of a majority of the peasants, who are very cautious in their decisions, is a lawful decision and a decision of the state. One may rely on the peasants in this respect. For instance, I have in my possession a decision of the Penza peasants,* which from the first point to the last is permeated by a spirit of extreme caution; the peasants are not undertaking an immediate reform for the whole of Russia, but they do not want to be driven into intolerable bondage; and they are right. The greatest bondage was bondage to the landlords and it still is bondage to those who own the land, to the oppressors. Therefore the abolition of this bondage must not be deferred for a single week, or for a single hour. But every seizure must be an organised seizure, it must not be made for the sake of private property, for the sake of division, but solely for the sake of the common use of the common land of the people.

I might finish with this question of seizure by replying that on the part of the landlords and capitalists the objections to our proposal are based on fraud, while on the part of the non-landlords and non-capitalists, on the part of those who desire to protect the interests of the toilers, they are based on misunderstanding and on excessive confidence in what the capitalists and the landlords falsely say of us. When our arguments are examined you will find that the just demand for the immediate abolition of the landed estates, as well as for the transfer of ownership of the land to the people, cannot be realised until the central state power assembles; but that we most emphatically recommend the immediate transfer of the possession of the land in the various localities to the peasants, on the understanding that not the slightest violation of order shall be permitted. We make this recommendation in our resolutions; it may be superfluous, for the peasants are putting it into practice in any case.

I now pass to the second question, one requiring particular attention, namely, what would be the most desirable and best way, in the interests of the toiling masses, to deal with the land when it has become the property of the whole people, when private ownership has been abolished? That hour in Russia is close at hand. For indeed the power of the landlords has been undermined, if not destroyed. What is to be done when the land is in the possession of all the peasants and when there are no landlords? How is the land to be divided? It seems to me that we must establish a general point of view on this question, since, of course, the disposal of the land will locally always be in the hands of the peasants. It cannot be otherwise in a democratic state. This is so obvious that it is superfluous to discuss it. But when it is asked what must be done so that the land shall be enjoyed by the toilers, we say that our desire is to protect the interests of the wage workers and the poor peasants. This is what our Party of Russian Bolshevik Social-Democrats considers to be its duty. When it is said that the land will be transferred to the people, we ask whether this is the same as saying that the land will be transferred to the toilers. And we reply: No, it is not the same! When it is said that the land will be transferred to the people, it means that the private property of the landlords will be abolished; it means that the whole land will belong to the whole people; it means that everyone who takes land takes it on lease from the whole people. If such a system is established, it will mean that all differences in forms of land possession will disappear, that all land will be on the same plane, or, as the peasants often say, that all the old partitions and fences will be removed; the land will become "unenclosed"; there will be free land and free labour.

Does that mean that the land is transferred to all the toilers? No, it does not. Free labour on free land means that all the old forms of landownership have been abolished; that there is no property in land except that of the state as a whole; that everybody rents his land from the state; that there is a general state power, the power of all the workers and peasants; that the peasant alone rents land from this power, as a tenant; that there are no middlemen between the state and the peasant; that everybody rents land on an equal footing. That is what is meant by free labour on free land.

Does that mean that the land is transferred to all the toilers? No, it does not. You cannot eat land; and in order to farm it implements, cattle, farm adjuncts and money are required; without money and without implements one cannot farm. Hence, when you establish a system of free labour on free land, there will be no landlordism, there will be no categories on the land. The land will be the property of the whole people, and free tenants will rent land from the state. When you establish that, it will not mean that the land has been transferred to all the toilers; it will only mean that every farmer will freely make use of the land; whoever desires it will freely take land from the state. In comparison with tsarist landlord Russia, that will be a great advance. It will be a great advance, because in landlord and tsarist Russia 70,000,000 dessiatins of land were in the hands of 30,000 Markovs, Romanovs, and similar landlords, whereas in this new Russia there will be free labour on free land. This has already been accomplished in many localities. Russia has already progressed as compared with tsarist and landlord Russia. However, that does not mean the transfer of the land to the toilers; it means the transfer of the land to the farmer. For it is not enough that the land should belong to the whole state, and that it should be taken by those who wish to farm it. The desire to farm alone is not enough; ability is required, and even ability is not enough. Every agricultural labourer and every peasant has the ability; but he has not the necessary cattle, implements, capital. Hence, no matter what you resolve, and no matter what you say, we shall not in this way establish free labour on free land. Even were we to post written announcements in every volost administration to the effect that the land is free, it would no more improve matters for the toilers than the prisons in West European republics cease to be prisons because they bear the device "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity." Were we to inscribe the legend "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity" on a factory, as is done in America, the factory would not thereby cease to be hell for the workers and paradise for the capitalists.

It follows that we must now think of the next step, namely, to secure something more than free labour, which is a forward step, but which is not yet a step towards safeguarding the interests of the toilers. It is a step towards emancipation from the rapacity of the landlords, from exploitation by the landlords, towards emancipation from the Markovs, from the police, and so forth; but it is not a step towards safeguarding the interests of the toilers, since without cattle, without implements, and without capital the poor and propertyless peasant cannot take advantage of the land. That is why I am very sceptical regarding the proposal for two standards, for two measures, the labour standard and the food standard. I know that the Narodnik parties are always arguing and explaining these standards. I know that these parties consider it necessary to establish these two standards, these two measures: the labour standard, i.e., the maximum amount of land a family can cultivate, and the food standard, i.e., the amount of land possession of less than which would mean starvation. I say that I am sceptical on this question of standards or measures; I consider it a bureaucratic plan, which can bring no good, which cannot be realised, even were you to decide upon that plan here. That is the crux of the matter. That plan can bring no appreciable relief to the wage workers and poor peasants. As long as capitalism rules, that plan, even were you to accept it, would remain a paper plan. That plan will not help us find the right way for the transition from capitalism to socialism.

When people speak of these two measures, these two standards, it is as though they imagined that only land and citizens exist; that nothing else in the world exists. If that were so, the plan would be a good one. But that is not the case. There is also the power of capital, the power of money. Without money there can be no husbandry, even on the freest land and with any "standards" you like. For as long as there is money there will be wage labour. And that means that the rich peasants, of whom there are no less than a million families in Russia, will oppress and exploit the wage workers, and will oppress them even on "free" land. These rich peasants constantly—not by way of exception, but as a general rule—resort to hiring labourers, by the year, by the season or by the day; that is, they exploit the poor peasants, the proletarians. And side by side with this, there are millions and millions of horseless peasants who cannot exist unless they sell their labour power, unless they resort to an outside trade, and so forth. As long as the power of money remains, no matter what "standards" are established, they will at best be unfit for practical application because they do not reckon with that important factor, namely, that property in implements, cattle and money is distributed unevenly. They do not reckon with the fact that wage labour exists, and that it is subject to exploitation. That is a fundamental factor in the life of present-day Russia, and it cannot be circumvented. And no matter what "standards" we established, they would be circumvented in practice, they would remain "standards" only on paper. That is why in order to safeguard the interests of the propertyless and poor peasants in this supreme reform of Russia which you are now undertaking, which you will undoubtedly succeed in carrying through, and in which private property in land will be abolished and a step will be taken towards bringing nearer a better future, a socialist future—in this supreme reform, which you are only just beginning, but which will go very far, for there is no force that can stop it, in order to safeguard the interests of the workers and the poor peasants one cannot adopt the method of standards and measures. A different method must be sought.

I and my comrades in the Party, on whose behalf I have the honour of speaking, know only two such methods of safeguarding the interests of the agricultural wage workers and the poor peasants. Those two ways we submit to the attention of the Peasants' Soviet.

The first way is to organise the agricultural wage workers and poor peasants. We desire and recommend that in every peasant committee, in every volost, uyezd and gubernia, there be formed a separate fraction, or a separate group, of agricultural wage workers and poor peasants, of such as should ask themselves: If the land tomorrow becomes the property of the whole people—and it will become so inevitably, because that is the will of the people—what shall we do? We who have no cattle or implements, where shall we obtain them? How shall we till the land? How shall we protect our interests? How shall we see to it that the land, when it becomes the property of the whole people, shall not fall into the hands of the masters only? If it falls into the hands of those who have sufficient cattle and implements, shall we have gained much thereby? Is it for that we accomplished this great change? Is that what we needed?

The land will belong to the "people." But that is not enough to protect the interests of the agricultural wage workers. The principal method is not to establish here, from above, or through a peasant committee, a "standard" of the amount of land to be held by isolated individuals. Such measures will be of no avail as long as capital rules; they will not save us from the rule of capitalism. In order to escape from the yoke of capitalism, in order that the land of the whole people shall pass to the toilers, there is only one basic method, namely, to organise the agricultural wage workers, who will be guided by their experience, by their observations, by their distrust of what the exploiters tell them, even though the latter deck themselves out in red favours and style themselves "revolutionary democrats."

The poor peasants will learn only by their independent organisation locally, and from their own experience. And that experience will be no easy one. We cannot and do not promise rivers flowing with milk and honey. No, the landlords will be overthrown, because such is the will of the people; but capitalism will remain. Its overthrow will be far more difficult, its overthrow will be reached by a different road. That road is the separate and independent organisation of the agricultural wage workers and poor peasants.

This is what our Party proposes in the first place. That road alone gives expectation of the gradual, difficult, but certain transfer of the land to the actual toilers.

The second step recommended by our Party is that every large farm, for instance every large landed estate, of which there are 30,000 in Russia, shall be transformed as quickly as possible into a model farm, to be worked jointly by agricultural workers and trained agriculturists, and with the application of the cattle, implements, etc., of the landlord. Unless such joint cultivation is undertaken, under the guidance of the Soviets of Agricultural Workers, we shall not obtain the transfer of the land to the toilers. Of course, joint cultivation is a difficult thing, and of course if anybody imagined that such joint cultivation can be decreed and imposed from above, it would be sheer madness; since the age-long predilection for individual husbandry cannot disappear at once; since money is required for such a purpose; and since adaptation to the new foundations of life is demanded. Were this counsel, this opinion concerning joint cultivation, common farm stock, and common cattle, with the application of the best implements and in common with agricultural experts—were this council but the invention of parties, the matter would be hopeless. For changes in the life of a people are never accomplished by the advice of a party, and because tens of millions of people do not undertake a revolution on the mere advice of parties. And such a change will be far more of a revolution than the overthrow of the imbecile Nicholas Romanov. I repeat, tens of millions of people do not undertake a revolution on order. They do so when privation has become desperate, when the condition of the people has become intolerable, and when the general pressure and determination of tens of millions of people shatter all the old partitions and are truly able to create a new life. When we recommend this measure, recommend that it be undertaken with caution, and declare that it is becoming essential, we have not deduced it from our programme, from our socialist doctrine, but have reached that conclusion because we are Socialists and have studied the life of the West European peoples. We know that many revolutions have taken place there, resulting in the creation of democratic republics. We know that in America in 1865 the slave-owners were defeated,* and that thereupon hundreds of millions of acres of land were distributed among the peasants free of charge, or almost free of charge; nevertheless capitalism dominates there as nowhere else, and is oppressing the toiling masses as much as, if not more than, in other countries. It is this socialist doctrine and these observations of other peoples that have led us to the firm conviction that unless the land is cultivated in common by the agricultural workers, with the application of the best machinery and under the guidance of scientifically trained agriculturists, there can be no escape from the yoke of capitalism. Were we, however, to confine ourselves solely to the experience of the West European states, our cause in Russia would be in a bad way, because the Russian people in the mass are capable of taking a real step along the new road only in case of dire necessity. And we say that the time has come when dire necessity is knocking at the door of the entire Russian people. This dire necessity consists in the fact that it is impossible to continue farming in the old way. If we continue, as of old, on our small farms, even as free citizens on free land, we shall still be faced with inevitable ruin, for economic chaos is looming larger every day and every hour. Everybody is saying that it is a fact—a fact that is the result not of the malice of individual persons, but of the World War of conquest, the result of capitalism.

The war has destroyed masses of people; the whole world is drenched in blood; the whole world has been brought to the brink of ruin by the war. This is no exaggeration. Nobody can vouch for the coming day. Everybody admits that. Take the Izvestiya of the Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies; everybody says there that the capitalists are resorting to sabotage and lockouts. That means that there is no work, and the capitalists are discharging workers wholesale. That is what this criminal war has led to, and not in Russia alone, but in all countries.

And that is why we say that individual husbandry on individual plots, even though it be "free labour on free land," offers no way out of the terrible crisis, and no escape from universal destruction. Universal labour service is required, and the greatest economy in the utilisation of human labour. An unusually strong and firm government power is needed, one capable of carrying universal labour service into effect. It cannot be carried into effect by state officials; it can be carried into effect only by Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies, because they are the people themselves, they are the mass of the people; because they are not a bureaucratic power; because, knowing peasant life from top to bottom, they can establish labour service, and can establish safeguards for human labour so that the labour of the peasants will not be dissipated, and the transition to joint cultivation will thus be accomplished gradually and circumspectly. It is a difficult task, but it is essential to adopt joint cultivation on large model farms. Without that there can be no escape from the chaos and no way out of the truly desperate condition in which Russia finds herself. It would be the greatest error to think that a reform of such colossal proportions can be effected at one stroke. No, it demands tremendous labour, it demands the effort, determination and energy of every single peasant and worker, each in his locality and at the work he knows best, in the branch of production he has been pursuing for many years. Such a thing cannot be accomplished to order; but accomplished it must be: because the predatory war has brought the whole of humanity to the brink of ruin, because tens of millions of people have perished, and many more will perish, in this frightful war, if we do not strain every effort, if all organisations of the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies do not take common vigorous action for the joint cultivation of the land without capitalists and without landlords. This path alone will lead to the actual transfer of the land to the toilers.

ON THE NECESSITY OF FOUNDING AN AGRICULTURAL WORKERS' UNION IN RUSSIA *

FIRST ARTICLE

ONE exceedingly important question must be submitted to the All-Russian Conference of Trade Unions now in session in Petrograd.  It is the question of forming an All-Russian Union of Agricultural Workers.

Every class of Russia is organising. Yet the class that is most exploited in Russia, that lives most poorly, that is most divided and most downtrodden—the class of agricultural wage workers—has, it would seem, been overlooked. Organisations of agricultural wage workers exist in some of the non-Russian provinces, in the Latvian Region, for instance. But there are no class organisations of the agricultural proletariat in the great majority of the Great-Russian and Ukrainian gubernias.

It is the bounden duty of the vanguard of the proletarians of Russia, the trade unions of the industrial workers, to come to the aid of their brothers, the agricultural workers. The difficulties of organising the agricultural workers are enormous—that is obvious, and it is confirmed by the experience of all capitalist countries.

All the more essential is it therefore to take advantage of the political freedom now existing in Russia to proceed as speedily and energetically as possible to found an All-Russian Union of Agricultural Workers. The Trade Union Conference is the body that can, and must, undertake this task. The more highly experienced, more developed and more class conscious representatives of the proletariat now assembled at this Conference can, and must, send out a call to the agricultural workers and invite them to join the ranks of the independently organised proletarians, the ranks of their trade unions. It is the wage workers of the factories who must take the initiative upon themselves, and utilise the nuclei, groups and branches of trade unions scattered all over Russia to arouse the agricultural worker to independent life, to active participation in the struggle for the improvement of his condition, and to the defence of his class interests.

It will probably appear to many, it may indeed be the prevailing opinion, that the present moment, when the peasants are organising all over Russia, proclaiming the abolition of private property in land and "equality" of land tenure, is not the time for the formation of a trade union of agricultural workers.

But the contrary is the case. Precisely at such a period it is particularly timely and urgent. Those who share the class proletarian point of view cannot doubt the soundness of the thesis adopted by the Mensheviks at the Stockholm Congress of the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party in 1906, upon the initiative of the Bolsheviks, and since that time incorporated in the programme of the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party. That thesis reads:

"The Party under all circumstances, and whatever the conditions of democratic agrarian reform may be, will unswervingly strive for the independent class organisation of the rural proletariat, will explain to the latter the irreconcilability of its interests with the interests of the peasant bourgeoisie, will warn it against the seduction of small husbandry, which, while commodity production exists, can never do away with the poverty of the masses, and, finally, will point out the necessity for a complete socialist revolution as the only means of abolishing poverty and exploitation."

There is not a single class conscious worker, not a single trade union member, who would not admit the soundness of these statements. Their practical realisation, as far as the independent class organisation of the agricultural proletariat is concerned, is the business of the trade unions.

We hope that precisely in these revolutionary times, when the toiling masses generally, and the workers in particular, are manifesting an earnest endeavour to assert themselves, to make a way for themselves, and not to permit the establishment of a new order without the independent settlement of labour questions by the workers themselves, the trade unions will not confine themselves to their narrow craft interests, will not forget their weaker brethren, the agricultural workers, and will make every effort to assist them by organising a union of the agricultural workers of Russia.

In the following article we shall endeavour to indicate a few practical steps in this direction.

SECOND ARTICLE

In the preceding article we dwelt on the fundamental importance of creating a union of agricultural workers in Russia. We shall now deal with certain practical aspects of this question.

A union of agricultural workers in Russia should embrace all who are principally, or for the most part, or even partly, engaged in agricultural enterprises as wage workers.

Experience will show whether or not it is expedient to subdivide such unions into unions of agricultural workers who are exclusively wage workers and unions of workers who are only in part wage workers. In any case, the point is not an essential one. The essential thing is that the fundamental class interests of all who sell their labour power are identical; and that it is absolutely essential to unite all who earn even part of their livelihood by hiring themselves to others.

The wage workers of the cities, of the factories and workshops, are bound by innumerable ties to the wage workers of the countryside. An appeal of the former to the latter is sure to meet with response. But a mere appeal is not enough. The urban workers possess far greater experience, knowledge, means and strength. A part of this strength must be definitely devoted to assisting the rise of the agricultural workers.

A day should be set, the earnings of all organised workers on which shall be contributed towards developing and strengthening the union between the wage workers of town and country. A certain part of this sum should be contributed directly by the city workers to the cause of class organisation of the agricultural workers. This fund should be used to cover the expenses of publishing a series of popular leaflets, of starting at first at least a weekly agricultural workers' paper, and of sending at least a few agitators and organisers into the countryside to set about the immediate formation of unions of agricultural wage workers in various localities.

Only their own experience will teach these unions the best path of future development. The first duty of every such union must be to improve the conditions of those who sell their labour power in agricultural enterprises, to fight for higher wages, better housing, better food, etc.

We must vigorously combat the false belief that the impending abolition of private property in land is capable of "giving land" to every agricultural worker and farm hand and of undermining the foundation of wage labour in agriculture. This is a false and extremely pernicious belief. The abolition of private property in land is a great and unquestionably progressive reform, a reform unquestionably conducive to the economic development of the proletariat and to the advancement of its interests, a reform which every wage worker will support with all his heart and strength, but which will in no way abolish wage labour.

The land cannot be eaten. It is impossible to farm land without cattle, implements and seed, and without a reserve of food and money. To rely on "promises," whatever their source, on promises that the wage worker in the countryside will be assisted in acquiring cattle, implements, etc., would be the worst kind of delusion and unpardonable naiveté.

The basic rule, the first commandment, of every trade union movement must be: Do not rely on the "state," rely solely on the strength of your own class. The state is the organisation of the ruling class.

Do not rely on promises; rely solely on the strength of the unity and class consciousness of your own class.

The aim of the Union of Agricultural Workers must therefore immediately be not only to fight for the general improvement of the lot of the workers, but also, and in particular, to protect their interests as a class in the great land reform which is impending.

"Farm hands must be placed at the disposal of the volost committees"—this is the frequent opinion of the peasants and the Socialist-Revolutionaries. The point of view of the class of agricultural wage workers is the very opposite: the volost committees must be placed at the disposal of the "hands"! This contrast strikingly illustrates the difference between the position of the masters and the position of the wage workers.

"The land must belong to the whole people." That is correct. But the people are divided into classes. Every worker knows, sees, feels and experiences this truth, a truth deliberately concealed by the bourgeoisie, and perpetually forgotten by the petty bourgeoisie.

Nobody will help the poor as isolated individuals. No "state" will ever help the rural wage worker, the farm hand, the day labourer, the poor peasant, the semi-proletarian, unless they help themselves. And the first step in this direction must be the independent class organisation of the agricultural proletariat.

Let us hope that the All-Russian Conference of Trade Unions will devote itself most energetically to this cause, will send out its call to the whole of Russia, and will extend a helping hand, the mighty hand of the organised vanguard of the proletarians, to the proletarians of the countryside.

July 7 and 8 (June 24 and 25), 1917

HOW THE PEASANTS WERE DECEIVED—AND WHY*

WE know that when peasant deputies from the whole of Russia assembled in Petrograd at the All-Russian Soviet of Peasants' Deputies they were promised—by the Socialist-Revolutionaries and by the government—that the sale and purchase of land would be prohibited immediately.

Minister Pereverzev was at first indeed inclined to carry out this promise and sent a telegram putting a stop to all transactions involving the sale and purchase of land. But later some invisible hand intervened, and Minister Pereverzev withdrew his telegram to the public notaries, i.e., he again sanctioned the sale and purchase of land.

The peasants grew uneasy. If we are not mistaken, they even sent a delegation to the Ministry.

The peasants were soothed; the peasants were reassured, as one reassures little children. They were assured that a law would be issued immediately prohibiting the sale and purchase of land and that Pereverzev's temporary order was "postponed" "only" because such a law was about to be issued.

The Socialist-Revolutionaries soothed the peasants and fed them on promises. The peasants believed them. The peasants were reassured. The peasants returned to their villages.

Weeks and weeks passed.

On July 7 (June 24)—not earlier—news appeared in the papers to the effect that Minister Chernov, leader of the Party of Socialist-Revolutionaries, had brought a bill into the government (only a bill as yet) for the prohibition of the sale and purchase of land.

On July 12 (June 29) the papers published the report of a "private conference" of the State Duma that had taken place on July 11 (June 28). At this Conference, according to Rech (a paper belonging to the majority party in the Provisional Government ¹), Mr. Rodzyanko

"in his concluding remarks dwelt on the question of transactions in land in connection with the new [oh yes, exceedingly new, new in the extreme!] measures of the government. He maintained that if deals in land were prohibited, the land would lose its value [for whom? for the landlords, obviously! But the peasants want to take the land away from the landlords!], all security for loans would depreciate, and the landowners [the former landowners, Mr. Rodzyanko] would be deprived of credit. From what sources, asks M. V. Rodzyanko, will the landowners pay their debts to the banks? In most cases the debts are already overdue, and such a bill would lead to the immediate abolition of all landed proprietorship by law, without auctions.

"In view of this, M. V. Rodzyanko proposed that the Conference should instruct the Provisional Committee to consider this question, and endeavour to prevent the passage of a bill which would be fatal not to private ownership of land but to the state."

Here, then, we have the "invisible hand" become visible! Here we have the "cunning mechanism" of the coalition government, with its near-Socialist ministers, let out of the bag by this gentleman—this former Chairman of the former State Duma, this former landlord, this former confidant of Stolypin the Hangman, this former protector of the agent-provocateur Malinovsky—Mr. Rodzyanko!

Let us even assume that now that Mr. Rodzyanko has so clumsily blurted out more than he should, the law prohibiting the sale and purchase of land will at last be passed. At last!

But that is not the whole point. The point is that this striking example should serve to make us understand, and help the peasant masses to understand, how the peasants were deceived, and why. For the fact is incontrovertible and indubitable: the peasants have been deceived, since what at the All-Russian Soviet of Peasants' Deputies they were promised would be fulfilled immediately was not fulfilled immediately.

How were the peasants deceived? They were fed on promises. That is the "cunning mechanism" employed by every coalition government in the world, i.e., by every bourgeois cabinet in which traitors to socialism participate. In these cabinets, the former Socialists serve—whether consciously or not is of no importance—as tools with the help of which the capitalists deceive the masses.

¹ I.e., the bourgeois People's Freedom Party, usually known as the Cadets.—Ed.

Why were the peasants deceived? Because the tools of deceit, the Socialist-Revolutionaries—we will make the assumption most favourable to them—themselves failed to understand the cunning mechanism of class domination and class policy in the present administration of Russia. The Socialist-Revolutionaries allowed themselves to be led astray by talk. But as a matter of fact, and as the Rodzyanko “incident” strikingly proves, Russia is actually being ruled by a bloc of two blocs, by an alliance of two alliances.

One bloc is the bloc of the Cadets with the monarchist landlords, among whom Mr. Rodzyanko occupies the first place. The existence of this bloc as a political fact was shown in the eyes of the whole of Russia during the Petrograd elections, when all the Black Hundred papers, all the papers to the Right of the Cadets, supported the Cadets. Thanks to the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks, this bloc has a majority in the government. This bloc delayed the prohibition of transactions involving the sale and purchase of land; this bloc is supporting the landlords and the capitalist lockouters.¹

The second bloc is the bloc of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks, which has deceived the people by empty promises. Skobelev and Tseretelli, Peshekhonov and Chernov made promises without end. It is easy to make promises. This method of the “Socialist” ministers, namely, of feeding the people on promises, has been tried in every advanced country in the world, and has everywhere ended in failure. The peculiar feature of Russia is that the failure of the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik parties will be more drastic and more precipitous than is usually the case, owing to the revolutionary situation in the country.

Let every worker and every soldier use this example, which is particularly instructive to the peasants, to explain to the peasants how and why they were deceived.

The peasants can achieve their ends not in a bloc (alliance) with the capitalists, but only in alliance with the workers.

July 14 (1), 1917

¹ Lenin calls the Russian bourgeoisie capitalist lockouters because in 1917, by disorganising industry and closing down factories, they endeavoured to establish their open dictatorship.—Ed.

PEASANTS AND WORKERS*

No. 88 of the Izvestiya of the All-Russian Soviet of Peasants' Deputies  of September 1 (August 19) contains an exceedingly interesting article, one that should become one of the basic documents in the hands of every Party propagandist and agitator working among the peasantry, and in the hands of every class conscious worker leaving for the agricultural districts, or in contact with the agricultural districts.

This article is entitled "Model Instructions Compiled from 242 Instructions Presented by Delegates from the Localities to the First All-Russian Congress of Peasants' Deputies in Petrograd in the Year 1917."

It is extremely to be desired that the Soviet of Peasants' Deputies publish particulars of these Instructions in the greatest possible detail (if it is absolutely impossible to publish them in full, which, of course, would be best of all). What is especially needed, for instance, is a complete list of the gubernias, uyezds and volosts concerned, with information as to how many Instructions came from each locality, the dates on which the Instructions were drawn up or presented, and an analysis of at least the chief demands, so that it might be seen whether there are differences between the various regions on various points. For instance, a district where land is held individually and one where it is held communally; districts populated by Great-Russians and districts populated by other nationalities; districts situated in the centre of the country and districts situated in outlying sections; districts which have never known serfdom, etc.; do they differ in any way in their attitude towards the abolition of private ownership of all peasant land, the periodic redistribution of land, the prohibition of hired labour, the confiscation of the landlords' implements and cattle, and so on and so forth? Without such detailed particulars a scientific study of the unusually valuable material contained in the peasants' Instructions is impossible. And we Marxists must take every pains to make a scientific study of the facts upon which our policy is based.

In the absence of better material, the Summary of Instructions (as we shall call the "Model Instructions"), if it be not proved incorrect as to facts, is unique, and, we repeat, should be in the possession of every member of our Party.

The first part of the Summary of Instructions is devoted to general political statements, to demands for political democracy; the second part is devoted to the land question. (Let us hope that the All-Russian Soviet of Peasants' Deputies, or somebody else, will make a summary of the peasants' Instructions and resolutions on the question of the war.*) We shall for the present not dwell in detail on the first part and shall mention only two points: Par. 6 demands that all officials be elected; Par. 11, the abolition, upon the conclusion of the war, of the standing army. These points bring the political programme of the peasants very close to the programme of the Bolshevik Party. In stressing these points, we must point out and demonstrate in all our propaganda and agitational work that the leaders of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks are traitors not only to socialism, but also to democracy; for in Kronstadt, for instance, against the will of the people, against the principles of democracy, they insisted, in complaisance to the capitalists, that the position of commissar should be confirmed by the government, i.e., should not be purely elective. In the Borough Dumas of Petrograd, as well as in other local government institutions, the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik leaders, contrary to democratic principles, are opposing the Bolshevik demand for the immediate organisation of a workers' militia and the subsequent organisation of a national militia.

The agrarian demands of the peasantry, according to the Summary of Instructions, consist, first of all, in the demand for the abolition, without compensation, of private ownership of land in all its forms, including peasant ownership; the transfer of highly cultivated lands to the state or to the communities; the confiscation of all livestock and farm implements on the lands confiscated

(the case of peasants with very little land is excluded) and their transfer to the state or to the communities; the prohibition of hired labour; the equable distribution of land among the toilers, with periodic redistribution, etc. As measures calculated to meet the exigencies of the transition period until the Constituent Assembly is convened, the peasants demand the immediate issue of laws prohibiting the sale and purchase of land; the abolition of the laws on the withdrawal from the communes and the formation of individual farms; the conservation of forests, fisheries etc.; the annulment of long-term leaseholds, the revision of short-term leaseholds, and so forth.

Very little reflection on the above demands is required to understand the utter impossibility of realising them by an alliance with the capitalists and, indeed, unless a complete break is made with the capitalists, unless a most resolute and merciless struggle is waged against the capitalist class, and its rule overthrown.

The self-deception of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the deceit they practise on the peasantry consist in the fact that they accept and spread the idea that such changes, changes of such a character, are possible without the overthrow of the domination of the capitalists, without the transfer of the whole power of the state to the proletariat, without support being given by the poor peasants to the proletarian state in its sweeping and revolutionary measures against the capitalists. It is this that makes the crystallisation of a Left Wing of the "Socialist-Revolutionaries" so significant, for it proves that the realisation of this deception is growing within the party itself.

And, indeed, the confiscation of all privately-owned land implies the confiscation of the hundreds of millions of capital of the banks in which these lands are for the most part mortgaged. Is such a measure conceivable, unless the revolutionary class smashes the resistance of the capitalists by revolutionary means? We must bear in mind that we are dealing here with the most centralised form of capital, bank capital, which is united by innumerable threads with all the most important centres of capitalist economy in a vast country, and which can be vanquished only by the not less centralised force of the urban proletariat.

Further, the transfer to the government of highly cultivated farms. Is it not obvious that a "state" which would be capable of taking over and really managing such farms for the benefit of the worker, and not for the benefit of the officials and the capitalists, must needs be a revolutionary proletarian state?

The confiscation of stud farms, etc., and of all livestock and farm implements—that is not only another tremendous blow to private property in the means of production; it is a step towards socialism. For the placing of farm implements at the "exclusive use of the state or the commune" implies the necessity for large-scale socialist agriculture, or, at least, socialist control over the united small estates, socialist regulation of their activities.

And the "prohibition" of hired labour? That is but an empty phrase, the helpless, unenlightened and naive yearning of down-trodden petty proprietors, who do not realise that all capitalist industry would come to a standstill if there were not a reserve army of wage labour in the villages, that it is impossible to "prohibit" hired labour in the country when it is permitted in the town, and that, as a matter of fact, the "prohibition" of hired labour would be a step towards socialism.

And this has brought us to the fundamental question of the relation of the workers to the peasants.

There has been a mass Social-Democratic labour movement in Russia for more than twenty years (if we count from the big strikes of 1896). Like a crimson thread the following question runs through this considerable interval, through two great revolutions, through the entire political history of Russia: Will the working class lead the peasants forward, towards socialism, or will the liberal bourgeoisie drag them backwards, to a reconciliation with capitalism?

The opportunist wing of the Social-Democrats reason in accordance with the following sapient formula: Since the Socialist-Revolutionaries are petty bourgeois, "we" reject their philistine utopian conception of socialism for a bourgeois negation of socialism. Marxism is happily replaced by Struvism,* while Menshevism sinks to the role of a lackey to the Cadets, and endeavours to "reconcile" the peasant to the domination of the bourgeoisie. Tseretelli and Skobelev, hand in hand with Chernov and Avksentyev, are busy signing the reactionary decrees of the Cadet landlords in the name of "revolutionary democracy"—that is the latest and most obvious expression of the part they are playing.

The revolutionary Social-Democrats, who have never abandoned their criticism of the petty-bourgeois illusions of the Socialist-Revolutionaries, and who have never combined with them unless it be against the Cadets, have always striven to emancipate the peasants from the influence of the Cadets and have always advocated, as against the philistine utopian conception of socialism, not a liberal reconciliation with capitalism, but a revolutionary proletarian path to socialism.

Now that the war has tremendously accelerated development, has rendered the crisis of capitalism acute in the extreme, and has forced the peoples to make an immediate choice between ruin and the adoption of urgent and determined measures towards socialism, the abysmal difference between semi-liberal Menshevism and revolutionary proletarian Bolshevism assumes prominence as a practical question involving the action of tens of millions of peasants.

Reconcile yourselves to the reign of capital, because "we" are not yet ripe for socialism—that is what the Mensheviks say to the peasants, thus, by the way, substituting the abstract question of "socialism" in general for the concrete question of whether the wounds caused by the war can be healed unless definite measures towards socialism are taken.

Reconcile yourselves to capitalism, because the Socialist-Revolutionaries are petty-bourgeois utopians—that is what the Mensheviks say to the peasants; and together with the Socialist-Revolutionaries they support the Cadet government. . . .

And the Socialist-Revolutionaries, beating their breasts, assure the peasants that they are opposed to a peace of any kind with the capitalists, that they have never regarded the Russian revolution as bourgeois—and that is precisely why they have formed a bloc with the opportunist Social-Democrats and are supporting a bourgeois government. . . . The Socialist-Revolutionaries will subscribe to any kind of programme of the peasantry, even the most revolutionary—but they never carry them out; they shelve them, fool the peasants with empty promises, and in practice waste months in “compromising” with the Cadets within the coalition government.

This outrageous, direct and palpable betrayal of the interests of the peasants by the Socialist-Revolutionaries in practice has changed the situation enormously. We must reckon with this change. We must not continue merely to agitate against the Socialist-Revolutionaries in the old way, in the way we did in 1902-03 and in 1905-07.* We must not confine ourselves to a theoretical confutation of petty-bourgeois illusions, such as “the socialisation of the land,” “equal land tenure,” “prohibition of hired labour,” etc.

That was on the eve of the bourgeois revolution, or when the bourgeois revolution was still incomplete, and our whole task then was primarily to bring about the downfall of the monarchy.

Now the monarchy has been overthrown. The bourgeois revolution is completed, inasmuch as Russia is now a democratic republic, with a government made up of Cadets, Mensheviks, and Socialist-Revolutionaries. And in three years the war has dragged us thirty years ahead; in Europe it has established universal labour service and the compulsory trustification of enterprises; it has brought the most advanced countries to a state of famine and unprecedented ruin and forced them to take measures towards socialism.

Only the proletariat and the peasantry can overthrow the monarchy—that, in those days, was the fundamental definition of our class policy. And that definition was a correct one. February and March 1917 corroborated it once again.

Only the proletariat, leading the poor peasantry (the semi-proletarians, as our programme calls them), can end the war by a democratic peace, can heal the wounds it has caused, and can begin to take measures towards socialism, measures which have become absolutely essential and urgent—such is the definition of our class policy at the present time.

From this it follows that the central point of our propaganda and agitation against the Socialist-Revolutionaries must be that they have betrayed the peasants. They represent not the mass of poor peasants, but a minority of rich peasant owners. They are leading the peasantry not towards an alliance with the workers, but towards an alliance with the capitalists, i.e., towards subjection to the capitalists. They have sold the interests of the toiling and exploited masses for berths in the government, for a coalition with the Mensheviks and the Cadets.

History, accelerated by the war, has made such forward strides that old formulas have acquired a new content. "Prohibition of hired labour" was at one time merely an empty phrase of the petty-bourgeois intellectual. In actual practice it now means something else: in the 242 Instructions millions of poor peasants have announced their desire to abolish hired labour; but they do not know how to accomplish it. We do know how to accomplish it. We know that it can be accomplished only by an alliance with the workers, and under their leadership, only by fighting the capitalists, and not by "compromising" with the capitalists.

This is the change we must make in our basic line of propaganda and agitation against the Socialist-Revolutionaries, and in the basic line of our speeches to the peasants.

The Socialist-Revolutionary Party has betrayed you, comrades peasants. It has betrayed the cabins and sided with the palaces; if not with the palaces of the monarch, at least with the palaces where the Cadets—the most bitter enemies of the revolution, and especially of the peasant revolution—participate in the government together with the Chernovs, the Peshckhonovs and the Avksentyevs.

Only the revolutionary proletariat, only the vanguard that unites it, the Bolshevik Party, can put into practice the programme of the poor peasants as set forth in their 242 Instructions. For the revolutionary proletariat is actually making for the abolition of hired labour, following the only true road—the overthrow of capital, and not by forbidding the hiring of labourers, not by prohibiting wage labour. The revolutionary proletariat is actually making for the confiscation of land, farm stock and technical agricultural enterprises—for that which the peasants want, and which the Socialist-Revolutionaries cannot give them.

That is the way the fundamental line of the speeches of the worker to the peasant must be changed. We workers can give you, and will give you, what the poor peasants want and seek, without always knowing where and how to seek it. We workers are defending our own interests against the capitalists, and at the same time we are defending the interests of the overwhelming majority of the peasantry, whereas the Socialist-Revolutionaries are allying themselves with the capitalists and betraying those interests.

* * *

Let us remind the reader of what Engels said on the peasant question shortly before his death. Engels stated that Socialists did not even dream of expropriating the small peasants, and that only the force of example could teach the latter the advantages of socialist mechanised agriculture.*

The war has now confronted Russia practically with a question of precisely this kind. There are not enough farm implements. They must be confiscated, but the highly cultivated estates must not be “divided up.”

The peasants have begun to understand this. Necessity has forced them to understand it. They have been forced to understand it by the war, because farm implements are nowhere to be got. What we have must be husbanded. Large-scale farms imply the husbanding of labour expended on farm implements, as well as on much else.

The peasants want to retain their small holdings, to equalise them according to standards, and to re-equalise them periodically. . . . Let them. No intelligent Socialist will quarrel with the poor peasants on this score. If the land is confiscated it will undermine the rule of the banks; if farm property is confiscated, it will undermine the rule of capital. And with the proletariat ruling in the centre, with political power transferred to the proletariat, the rest will come of itself; it will come by “force of example,” it will be prompted by experience itself.

The crux of the matter is the transfer of political power to the proletariat. Given that, everything essential and fundamental in the programme of the 242 Instructions will become possible of realisation. And actual experience will show what modifications are needed in the realisation. That is the last thing to worry about. We are not doctrinaires. Our teaching is not a dogma, but a guide to action.

We do not claim that Marx or the Marxists know the road to socialism in every concrete detail. That would be nonsense. We know the direction of the road, we know what class forces are following the road; but the concrete and practical details will be learned only from the experience of the millions when they begin to take action.

Trust the workers, comrades peasants; break your alliance with the capitalists! Only in close union with the workers can you begin to realise the programme contained in the 242 Instructions. In alliance with the capitalists and under the direction of the Socialist-Revolutionaries, you will never live to see a single effective and unalterable step taken in the spirit of that programme.

But when, in union with the urban workers, in a merciless struggle against capital, you begin to carry out the programme of the 242 Instructions, the whole world will come to your aid and to ours, and the success of this programme—not as it is now formulated, but in its essence—will be assured. That will mark the end of the domination of capital and of wage slavery. That will mark the beginning of the reign of socialism, the reign of peace, the reign of the toilers.

September 11 (August 29), 1917

POSTSCRIPT TO THE BOOK THE AGRARIAN PROGRAMME OF SOCIAL-DEMOCRACY IN THE FIRST RUSSIAN REVOLUTION, 1905-07 *

THIS book was written at the end of 1907. In 1908 it was printed in St. Petersburg, but was seized and destroyed by the tsarist censor. Only one copy survived, in which, however, the last part (p. 270 et seq. in the present edition) is missing; so that this part has been added now.

At the present time the revolution renders the agrarian question in Russia infinitely wider, profounder and acuter than was the case in 1905-07. An acquaintance with the history of the programme of our Party during the first revolution will, I hope, facilitate a more correct understanding of the aims of the present revolution.

The following circumstance must be particularly emphasised. The war has inflicted such untold miseries upon the belligerent countries, and has at the same time so tremendously accelerated the development of capitalism by transforming monopoly capitalism into state monopoly capitalism, that neither the proletariat nor the revolutionary petty-bourgeois democracy can now confine themselves within the limits of capitalism.

Reality has already passed beyond these limits, and has rendered urgent such questions as the regulation of production and distribution on a nation-wide scale, universal labour service, compulsory trustification, etc.

Under such circumstances, the nationalisation of the land advocated in the agrarian programme also inevitably assumes a different aspect. Nationalisation of the land is now no longer "the last word" of the bourgeois revolution, but is a step towards socialism. It is impossible to combat the disasters inflicted by the war unless such steps are taken.

In leading the poor peasantry, the proletariat is obliged, on the one hand, to shift the centre of gravity from the Soviets of Peasants' Deputies to the Soviets of Agricultural Workers' Deputies, and, on the other, to demand the nationalisation of the agricultural implements of the landed estates, as well as the transformation of these estates into model farms under the control of the latter Soviets.

I cannot, of course, dwell here in greater detail on these important questions, and must refer the interested reader to current Bolshevik literature and to my pamphlets Letters on Tactics and The Tasks of the Proletariat in Our Revolution (Draft of a Platform for the Proletarian Party).¹

October (September) 1917

¹ Pp. 31-44 and 45-76 in this volume.—Ed.

A NEW FRAUD PRACTISED ON THE PEASANTS BY THE SOCIALIST-REVOLUTIONARY PARTY *

ON October 31 (18) and November 1 (October 19), the Socialist-Revolutionary Party in its chief newspaper, Dyelo Naroda, solemnly declared to the whole country that the new agrarian bill of the Minister for Agriculture is "a great step towards the realisation of the agrarian programme of the party," and that "the Central Committee of the party urges all organisations of the party to develop energetic propaganda in favour of the bill and to popularise it among the masses."

In reality, this bill, introduced by Minister S. L. Maslov, a member of the Socialist-Revolutionary Party, the main features of which are given in Dyelo Naroda, is a fraud on the peasants. The Socialist-Revolutionary Party has deceived the peasants: it has abandoned its own agrarian bill and accepted the plan of the landlords and the Cadets for a "fair valuation" and for the preservation of landed proprietorship. The Socialist-Revolutionary Party at its congresses during the first (1905) and second (1917) Russian revolutions solemnly and publicly promised to support the peasants' demand for the confiscation of the landed estates, i.e., for their transfer to the peasants without compensation. Mr. S. L. Maslov's present bill not only leaves the property rights of the landlords intact, but even provides that the payments of the peasants for the lands "rented" on a "fair" valuation are to be made to the landlords.

Mr. S. L. Maslov's bill is an utter betrayal of the peasants by the Socialist-Revolutionary Party. It means that this party has completely deserted to the side of the landlords. We must strain every effort, we must exert all our strength to achieve the widest possible recognition of this truth by the peasants.

Dyelo Naroda of October 31 (18) printed Pars. 25-40 of S. L. Maslov's bill. Here are the main, fundamental features of the bill:

1) Not all the landed estates are to form part of the projected "provisional land lease fund."

2) The inclusion of landed estates in this fund is to be effected by Land Committees created under the law of May 4 (April 21), 1917, passed by the government of Prince Lvov, a landlords' government.

3) The amount of rent to be paid to the landlords by the peasants is to be fixed by the Land Committees "according to the net revenue derived," and, after deduction of various payments, accrues "to the respective owners," i.e., to the landlords.

This is a triple deceit of the peasants by the Socialist-Revolutionaries, and it is therefore necessary to dwell on each of these points in greater detail.

The Izvestiya of the All-Russian Soviet of Peasants' Deputies of September 1 (August 19), No. 88, has printed "Model Instructions" compiled from 242 Instructions presented by deputies from various localities to the First All-Russian Congress of Soviets of Peasants' Deputies held in Petrograd in 1917.¹

No better material can be imagined than this summary of 242 Instructions, drawn up by the elected representatives of the peasants in their localities, for forming an opinion of the peasants' desires. And this summary shows with perfect clarity the fraud practised on the peasantry by S. L. Maslov's bill and by the Socialist-Revolutionary Party.

The peasants demand the abolition of private property in land; the conversion of all privately-owned and other lands into the property of the whole people, without compensation; the conversion of highly cultivated estates (orchards, plantations, etc.) into "model farms" to be run "exclusively by the state and the communes"; the confiscation of "all livestock and farm implements"; and so on.

This is the way the demands of the peasants are formulated, precisely and clearly, in the 242 Instructions drawn up by the peasants themselves in their localities.

But the Socialist-Revolutionary Party, having formed a "coalition" with the bourgeoisie (capitalists) and the landlords, and participating in a government of capitalists and landlords, has now drawn up a bill which does not abolish landed property but only assigns part of the landed estates to a provisional land lease fund!

¹ See note to p. 380.*—Ed.

According to the bill, orchards, plantations, sugar-beet fields, etc., must not be included in the lease fund! Nor may there be included in the fund land required "for the needs of the owner himself, his family, his employees and workers, and for the maintenance of his livestock"!

That means that a rich landlord who possesses a sugar refinery or potato distillery, oil presses or flour mills, orchards and plantations, hundreds of head of cattle and dozens of employees and workers, will retain possession of a vast economic enterprise, and a capitalist enterprise at that. That is how brazenly and shamelessly the Socialist-Revolutionary Party has deceived the peasants.

The inclusion of the landed—or, as the bill has it, "privately-owned"—estates in the land lease fund will be effected by the Land Committees created under the law of May 4 (April 21), 1917, which was passed by the government of Prince Lvov and Co.—a landlords' government, the government of the Milyukovs and Guchkovs, the imperialists and plunderers of the masses, which the workers and soldiers of Petrograd smashed in the movement of May 3-4 (April 20-21), i.e., fully half a year ago.

Obviously, the law on the Land Committees passed by this landlords' government is far from being a democratic (people's) law. On the contrary, this law contains a number of outrageous departures from democracy. For instance, Par. 11 of this law gives "the gubernia Land Committees the right to suspend the decisions of volost and uyezd Committees pending final decision by the Chief Land Committee." And the Committees are, in accordance with the fraudulent law written by the landlords, so constituted that the uyezd Committees are less democratic than the volost Committees, the gubernia Committees are less democratic than the uyezd Committees, and the Chief Committee less democratic than the gubernia Committees.

The volost Land Committees are entirely elected by the population of the volost. The uyezd Committees, according to the law, include, for instance, a justice of the peace and five members of the "provisional Executive Committees" (pending the organisation of new local government bodies). The gubernia Committees include not only a member of the circuit court and a justice of the peace, but also a representative of the Ministry, appointed by the Minister, and so forth. The Chief Land Committee includes twenty-seven members "invited by the Provisional Government"! It also includes one representative from each of the eleven political parties, whereby the majority (six out of eleven) falls to the Cadets and the parties to the Right of the Cadets. What is this if not a fraud on the part of Lvov and Shingarev (who signed the law) and their friends? What is this if not a mockery of democracy to please the landlords?

Does this not entirely corroborate the declarations repeatedly made by the Bolsheviks that Soviets of Peasants' Deputies, which are elected by the mass of the toilers and subject to recall by them at any time, are alone able to correctly express the will of the peasantry and give it practical effect?

The Socialist-Revolutionaries, who, thanks to the unenlightened trustfulness of the peasants, obtained a majority in the All-Russian Executive Committee of the Soviets of Peasants' Deputies, have betrayed the peasants. They have betrayed the Peasants' Soviets, they have deserted to the side of the landlords, and have reconciled themselves to the law of the landlord Prince Lvov on the Land Committees. That is the second great fraud practised on the peasants by the Socialist-Revolutionaries.

All the more emphatically must we, the workers' party, insist on the demand of the Bolsheviks that all power in the villages pass to the Soviets of Peasants' Deputies and Agricultural Workers' Deputies.

The peasant Instructions demand the confiscation, the alienation of landlords' estates without compensation, the confiscation of stud farms and private cattle-breeding and poultry-breeding farms, the transfer to the state of all highly cultivated estates, and the confiscation of all the livestock and farm implements of the landed estates.

Instead of this, the ministerial bill of the Socialist-Revolutionaries treats the peasants with the preservation of rent, which, as hitherto, is to pass into the pocket of the landlord!

"Rent," runs Par. 33 of the bill of the Socialist-Revolutionaries, "shall be paid into the Committees, which (having made all due payments to the state, etc.) shall hand over the balance to the respective owners."

And so the "Socialist-Revolutionaries," having fooled the peasants with extravagant promises, present the peasants with a landlord and Cadet agrarian bill.

That is an utter fraud on the peasants.

Absolutely nothing remains of the peasants' demands for confiscation. Instead of the confiscation of landed property, we have its consolidation by a "republican" government, which guarantees the landlords the preservation of their farm implements, land for the maintenance of their "employees and workers," land "designed" (it is enough that it shall be "designed") by the owners for sowing under sugar-beet and other industrial crops, as well as payment for the remaining land, which passes into the land lease fund. The Land Committees are transformed into rent collectors for the landed gentry.

The Socialist-Revolutionaries are not abolishing landed proprietorship; they are fortifying it. Their desertion to the landlords and their betrayal of the peasants is being revealed beyond all shadow of doubt.

We must not allow ourselves to be fooled by the crafty Cadets, the loyal friends of the capitalists and landlords. The Cadets are pretending that the bill of the Socialist-Revolutionaries is extraordinarily "revolutionary." All the bourgeois papers are raising a hue-and-cry against the bill; everywhere statements are being published describing the "resistance" put up by the bourgeois ministers (and, of course, by their direct henchmen, like Kerensky) to this "terrible" bill. All this is a farce, a game, the bid of a haggling merchant, who sees the spinelessness of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and hopes to drive a better bargain. The fact is that S. L. Maslov's bill is a landlords' bill, a bill written for the purpose of reaching a compromise with the landlords and saving them.

When the issues of Dyelo Naroda above referred to term this bill "an outstanding agrarian bill, which starts [!] the great [!]" reform for the socialisation [!!!] of the land," this is pure charlatanism. There is not a trace of "socialisation" in the bill (except perhaps the "social" aid to the landlord in guaranteeing his rents); there is absolutely nothing "revolutionary-democratic" in it; there is nothing in it generally, except "reforms" of the Irish type customary to European bourgeois reformism.*

We repeat, this is a bill designed to save the landlords and to "pacify" the rising peasant revolt¹ by making trivial concessions, while retaining everything essential for the landlords.

The introduction of this shameful bill by the Socialist-Revolutionaries is a clear illustration of the unprecedented hypocrisy of those who are denouncing the Bolsheviks for attempting to frustrate the Constituent Assembly by planning to transfer the power to the Soviets. "Only forty days separate us from the Constituent Assembly," is the hypocritical cry of the Cadets, capitalists, landlords, Mensheviks, and Socialist-Revolutionaries. And under cover of the hubbub, a momentous agrarian bill is being introduced, a bill for defrauding the peasants, enslaving them to the landlords, and consolidating landed property.

When it is necessary to protect the landlords against the growing tide of peasant revolt, it is "possible" to carry through so momentous a bill forty, or even thirty days before the Constituent Assembly.

But when it is a question of transferring the entire power to the Soviets, in order that all the land may be handed over to the peasants, in order that landed property may be abolished immediately, in order that a just peace may be proposed immediately—oh, then the Cadets, the capitalists, the landlords, the Mensheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionaries raise a concerted howl against the Bolsheviks.

Let the peasants know how the Socialist-Revolutionary Party has defrauded them, how it has betrayed them to the landlords.

Let the peasants know that only the workers' party, only the Bolsheviks, are firmly and irrevocably against the capitalists and the landlords and for the poor peasantry and all the toilers.

November 2 (October 20), 1917

¹ See note to p. 305.*—Ed.

PART V

THE OCTOBER REVOLUTION AND ITS SIGNIFICANCE

THE SECOND ALL-RUSSIAN CONGRESS OF SOVIETS OF WORKERS' AND SOLDIERS' DEPUTIES

*November 7-8 (October 25-26), 1917 **

TO THE WORKERS, SOLDIERS AND PEASANTS

THE Second All-Russian Congress of Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies has begun. A vast majority of the Soviets are represented at the Congress. There are also present a number of delegates from the Peasants' Soviets. The mandate of the compromising Central Executive Committee has terminated. Backed by the will of the vast majority of workers, soldiers and peasants, backed by the successful uprising of the workers and of the garrison in Petrograd, the Congress takes the power of government into its hands.

The Provisional Government has been overthrown. The majority of the members of the Provisional Government are already arrested.

The Soviet government will propose an immediate democratic peace to all peoples and an immediate armistice on all fronts. It will secure the transfer of the estates of the landlords, appanages and monasterial lands to the control of the peasants' committees without compensation, it will protect the rights of the soldiers by introducing complete democracy in the army; it will establish workers' control over production; it will see to it that the Constituent Assembly is convened at its appointed time; it will see to it that bread is supplied to the cities and articles of prime necessity to the villages; it will guarantee all the nations inhabiting Russia the genuine right of self-determination.

The Congress decrees: all power in the localities shall pass to the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies, which must guarantee genuine revolutionary order.

The Congress calls upon the soldiers in the trenches to be watchful and firm. The Congress of Soviets is convinced that the revolutionary army will succeed in defending the revolution from all attacks of imperialism until such time as the new government succeeds in concluding a democratic peace, which it will propose directly to all the peoples. The new government will take measures to supply all the needs of the revolutionary army by resorting to a determined policy of requisitioning and taxation of the propertied classes, and also to improve the condition of the soldiers' families.

The Kornilovists—Kerensky, Kaledin and others—are attempting to bring troops against Petrograd.* A few detachments who, duped by Kerensky, had moved on Petrograd, have come over to the side of the people in revolt.

Soldiers, actively resist the Kornilovist Kerensky! Be on your guard!

Railwaymen, hold up the troop trains dispatched by Kerensky against Petrograd!

Soldiers, workers, and employees, the fate of the revolution and the fate of the democratic peace is in your hands!

Long live the Revolution!

The All-Russian Congress of Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies

The Delegates from the Peasants' Soviets

November 8 (October 26), 1917

REPORT ON THE PEACE QUESTION, NOVEMBER 8 (OCTOBER 26), 1917¹

The question of peace is a burning and painful question of the day. Much has been said and written on the subject, and you have all, no doubt, discussed it not a little. Permit me, therefore, to proceed to read a declaration which the government you have elected must publish.

¹ See note to p. 399.*—Ed.

Decree on Peace

The workers' and peasants' government created by the revolution of November 6-7 (October 24-25) and backed by the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies calls upon all the belligerent peoples and their governments to start immediate negotiations for a just and democratic peace.

By a just, or democratic, peace, for which the vast majority of the working and toiling classes of all belligerent countries, exhausted, tormented and racked by the war, are craving, a peace that has been most definitely and insistently demanded by the Russian workers and peasants ever since the overthrow of the tsarist monarchy—by such a peace the government means an immediate peace without annexations (i.e., the seizure of foreign lands, or the forcible incorporation of foreign nations) and indemnities.

The government of Russia calls upon all the belligerent nations to conclude such a peace immediately, and expresses its readiness to take the most resolute measures without the least delay, pending the final ratification of the conditions of this peace by plenipotentiary assemblies of the people's representatives of all countries and all nations.

In accordance with the sense of justice of the democracy in general, and of the toiling classes in particular, the government interprets the annexation, or seizure, of foreign lands as meaning the incorporation into a large and powerful state of a small or feeble nation without the definitely, clearly and voluntarily expressed consent and wish of that nation, irrespective of the time such forcible incorporation took place, irrespective of the degree of development or backwardness of the nation forcibly annexed to, or forcibly retained within, the frontiers of the given state, and finally, irrespective of whether the nation inhabits Europe or distant, overseas countries.

If any nation whatsoever is forcibly retained within the boundaries of a given state, if, in spite of its expressed desire—no matter whether that desire is expressed in the press, at popular meetings, in party decisions, or in protests and revolts against national oppression—it is not permitted the right to decide the forms of its state existence by a free vote, taken after the complete evacuation of the troops of the incorporating or, generally, of the stronger nation, without the least pressure being brought to bear upon it, such incorporation is annexation, i.e., seizure and coercion.

The government considers that it would be the greatest of crimes against humanity to continue this war for the purpose of dividing up among the strong and rich nations the feeble nationalities seized by them, and solemnly declares its determination to sign immediately conditions of peace terminating this war on the conditions indicated, which are equally just for all peoples without exception.

At the same time the government declares that it does not regard the above-mentioned terms of peace as an ultimatum; in other words, it is prepared to consider any other conditions of peace, but only insists that they be advanced as speedily as possible by any of the belligerent nations, and that in the conditions of peace proposed there should be absolute clarity and the complete absence of all ambiguity and secrecy.

The government abolishes secret diplomacy and, for its part, expresses its firm determination to conduct all negotiations quite openly before the whole people. It will immediately proceed to the full publication of the secret treaties ratified or concluded by the government of landlords and capitalists during the period March (February) to November 7 (October 25), 1917. The government proclaims the absolute and immediate annulment of the contents of all such secret treaties, since they are aimed, as in the majority of cases they are, at securing advantages and privileges for the Russian landlords and capitalists and at the retention, or extension, of the annexations made by the Great-Russians.

Appealing to the governments and peoples of all countries immediately to begin open negotiations for the conclusion of peace, the government, for its part, expresses its readiness to conduct such negotiations in writing or by telegraph, or by negotiations between representatives of the various countries, or at a conference of representatives. In order to facilitate such negotiations, the government is commissioning its plenipotentiary representatives to neutral countries.

The government proposes to all the governments and peoples of the belligerent countries to conclude an immediate armistice and, for its part, considers it desirable that the armistice should be concluded for no less than three months, i.e., for a period long enough to permit the conclusion of negotiations for peace with the participation of the representatives of all peoples and nations involved in or compelled to take part in the war, without exception, and the summoning of plenipotentiary assemblies of the representatives of the peoples of all countries for the final ratification of the terms of peace.

While addressing this proposal for peace to the governments and peoples of all the belligerent countries, the Provisional Workers' and Peasants' Government of Russia appeals in particular to the class conscious workers of the three most advanced nations of mankind, the largest states participating in the present war, namely, Great Britain, France and Germany. The workers of these countries have made the greatest contributions to the cause of progress and socialism; they have furnished the great examples of the Chartist movement in England,* a number of revolutions of world and historic importance made by the French proletariat, and, finally, the heroic struggle against the Anti-Socialist Law in Germany and the example shown to the workers of the whole world in the protracted, persistent and disciplined work of creating mass proletarian organisations in Germany. All these examples of proletarian heroism and historical creative work serve as a pledge that the workers of the countries mentioned will understand the duty that now lies upon them of emancipating mankind from the horrors of war and its consequences. For these workers, by comprehensive, determined, and supremely energetic action, can help us to bring to a successful conclusion the cause of peace, and at the same time the cause of the emancipation of the toiling and exploited masses of the population from all forms of slavery and all forms of exploitation.

* * *

The Workers' and Peasants' Government created by the revolution of November 6-7 (October 24-25) and backed by the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies, must begin immediate negotiations for peace. Our appeal must be directed both to the governments and to the peoples. We cannot ignore the governments, for that would delay the possibility of concluding peace, and the people's government dare not do that; but we have no right not to appeal to the peoples at the same time. Everywhere there are differences between the governments and the peoples, and we must therefore help the peoples to interfere in the question of war and peace. We will, of course, insist upon the whole of our programme for a peace without annexations and indemnities. We shall not retreat from that programme; but we must deprive our enemies of the opportunity of declaring that their conditions are different from ours and that therefore it is useless to start negotiations with us. No, we must deprive them of that advantageous position and not advance our terms in the form of an ultimatum. Therefore the point is included that we are ready to consider all terms of peace and all proposals. We shall consider them, but that does not necessarily mean that we shall accept them. We shall submit them to the consideration of the Constituent Assembly, which will have the power to decide what concessions can or cannot be made. We are combating the duplicity of governments which in words talk of peace and justice, but in fact wage annexationist and predatory wars. There is not a single government that will say all it thinks. We, however, are opposed to secret diplomacy and will act openly in the eyes of the whole people. We do not, and never did, close our eyes to difficulties. War cannot be ended by refusal, it cannot be ended by one side only. We are proposing an armistice for three months, but shall not reject a shorter period, so that the exhausted army may breathe freely even for a little while, and because, moreover, in all the civilised countries national assemblies must be summoned for the discussion of terms.

In proposing the conclusion of an immediate armistice, we appeal to the class conscious workers of the countries that have done so much for the development of the proletarian movement.

We appeal to the workers of England, where there was the Chartist movement, to the workers of France, who have in repeated insurrections displayed the strength of their class consciousness, and to the workers of Germany, who waged the fight against the Anti-Socialist Law and have created powerful organisations.

In the manifesto of March 27 (14) we called for the overthrow of the bankers,* but, far from overthrowing our own bankers, we entered into an alliance with them. Now we have overthrown the government of the bankers.

The government and the bourgeoisie will make every effort to unite their forces and drown the workers' and peasants' revolution in blood. But the three years of war have been a good lesson to the masses: Soviet movements in other countries, the mutiny in the German fleet, which was crushed by the Junkers of the hangman Wilhelm. Finally, we must remember that we are not living in the wilds of Africa, but in Europe, where news can spread quickly.

The workers' movement will triumph and will lay the path to peace and to socialism.

* * *

REPORT ON THE LAND QUESTION, NOVEMBER 8 (OCTOBER 26) 1917¹

We consider that the revolution has demonstrated and proved how important it is that the land question should be stated clearly. The outbreak of the armed insurrection, the second, or October, Revolution, clearly proves that the land must be handed over to the peasants. A crime was committed by the government that has been overthrown and by the compromising parties of the Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries, who kept postponing the settlement of the land question on various pretexts and thereby brought the country to a state of ruin and faced it with a peasant revolt. False, cowardly and deceitful sound their statements regarding the pogroms and anarchy in the villages. Where and when did pogroms and anarchy result from wise measures? If the government had acted wisely, and if their measures had met the needs of the peasant poor, would there have been unrest among the peasant masses? But all the measures of the government, approved by the Avksentyev and Dan Soviets, were directed against the peasants and forced them into revolt.¹

¹ See note to p. 399.*—Ed.

Having brought about an insurrection, the government began to howl about the pogroms and anarchy for which they themselves were responsible. They would fain have crushed the insurrection by blood and iron, but were themselves swept away by the armed revolt of the revolutionary soldiers, sailors and workers. The first duty of the government of the workers' and peasants' revolution is to settle the land question, which can pacify and satisfy the vast masses of the peasant poor. I shall read you the points of a decree your Soviet government must issue. In one of the points of that decree are embodied the Instructions to the Land Committees which have been compiled from 242 Instructions from local Soviets of Peasants' Deputies.

Decree on the Land

1) Landed proprietorship is abolished forthwith without compensation.

2) The landed estates, as also all appanages, the monasterial and church lands, with all their livestock, implements, farm buildings and everything pertaining thereto, shall be placed under the control of the volost Land Committees and the uyezd Soviets of Peasants' Deputies pending the meeting of the Constituent Assembly.

3) All damage to confiscated property, which henceforth belongs to the whole people, is declared to be a felony, punishable by the revolutionary courts. The uyezd Soviets of Peasants' Deputies shall take all necessary measures for the preservation of the strictest order during the confiscation of the estates of the landlords, for determining estates of which size and which particular estates shall be subject to confiscation, for drawing up inventories of all property confiscated and for the strictest revolutionary protection of all land transferred to the people and all structures, implements, cattle, supplies, etc.

¹ See note to p. 305. *—Ed.

4) The following peasant Instructions, compiled from 242 local peasant Instructions, as published in No. 88 of the Izvestiya of the All-Russian Soviet of Peasants' Deputies (Petrograd, September 1 [August 19], 1917), are everywhere to serve as a guide in carrying through the great land reforms pending their final ratification by the Constituent Assembly.

5) The land of ordinary peasants and ordinary Cossacks shall not be confiscated.¹

THE PEASANT INSTRUCTIONS ON THE LAND

The question of the land in its full scope can be settled only by a National Constituent Assembly.

The most just settlement of the land question is as follows:

1) The right of private property in land shall be abolished in perpetuity: land shall not be purchased, sold, leased, mortgaged, or otherwise alienated.

All land, whether state, appanage, tsar's, monasterial, church, factory, primogenitory, private, public, peasant, etc., shall be taken over without compensation and become the property of the whole people, to be used by those who cultivate it.

Persons who suffer by this property revolution shall be entitled to public support only for a period necessary for adaptation to their new conditions of existence.

2) All mineral wealth, e.g., ore, oil, coal, salt, etc., as well as all forests and waters of state importance, shall be reserved for the exclusive use of the state. Small streams, lakes, woods, etc., shall be reserved for the use of the communes and be administered by the local government bodies.

3) Lands with highly developed forms of cultivation, e.g., orchards, plantations, nurseries, hothouses, etc., shall not be divided up, but shall be transformed into model farms to be cultivated exclusively either by the state or by the communes, according to their size and importance.

Urban and village household land, orchards and gardens shall remain in the use of their present owners, the size of such holdings, and the amount of taxation levied for the use thereof, to be determined by law.

4) Stud farms, government and private pedigree stock and poultry farms, etc., shall be confiscated and become the property of the whole people; they shall be run exclusively by the state or by the communes, according to their size and importance.

¹ In the text of the Decree on the Land as originally printed point 5 comes after the Peasant Instructions on the Land Question, which appertain to point 4.—Ed.

The question of compensation is subject to the decision of the Constituent Assembly.

5) All livestock and farm implements of the confiscated lands shall be reserved for the exclusive use of either the state or the communes, according to their size and importance, and no compensation shall be paid therefor.

The farm implements of peasants possessing little land shall not be subject to confiscation.

6) The right to use the land shall belong to all citizens of the Russian state (without distinction of sex) desiring to cultivate it by their own labour, with the help of their families, or in partnership, and only as long as they are able to cultivate it by their own efforts. The employment of hired labour is prohibited.

In the event of the accidental physical disablement of any member of a village community for a period of two years, the village community shall be obliged to assist him within this period by means of collective cultivation of his land, until he is again able to work.

Peasants who, owing to age or ill-health, are permanently disabled from personally cultivating the land shall lose their right to the use of it, but, in return, shall receive a pension from the state.

7) Land tenure shall be on an equality basis, i.e., the land shall be distributed among the toilers in conformity with either the labour standard or the consumption standard, as local conditions shall warrant.

There shall be absolutely no restriction as to the forms of land tenure: household, farm, communal, or co-operative, as shall be determined in each individual village.

8) All land, when alienated, shall pass into the land fund of the people. Its distribution among the toilers shall be controlled by the local and central government bodies, from democratically organised village and city communes, without distinction of social rank, to central oblast government bodies.

The land fund shall be subject to periodical redistribution, in accordance with the growth of population and the increase in the productiveness and efficiency of agriculture.

When the boundaries of allotments are altered, the primary nucleus of the allotment must be left intact.

The land of lapsed members shall revert to the land fund; preferential right to such land shall belong to the near relatives of the lapsed member, or to persons designated by him.

In the case of land which has reverted to the land fund, the cost of fertiliser and improvements put into the soil, to the extent that they have not been fully exhausted, shall be compensated.

Should the available land fund in a particular district prove inadequate for the needs of the population, the surplus population shall be settled elsewhere.

The state shall take upon itself the organisation of resettlement and shall bear the cost thereof, as well as the cost of supplying implements, etc.

Resettlement shall be effected in the following order: first of all, landless peasants desiring to resettle, then members of the commune of depraved or vicious habits, deserters, and so on, and the remainder by lot or by agreement.

The entire contents of these Instructions, as expressing the absolute will of the vast majority of the class conscious peasants of the whole of Russia, are declared a provisional law, which, pending the meeting of the Constituent Assembly, shall be carried into effect as far as possible immediately, and as to certain of its provisions with the due gradualness, as shall be determined by the uyezd Soviets of Peasants' Deputies.

* * *

I hear voices stating that the decree itself and the Instructions were drawn up by the Socialist-Revolutionaries. Be it so. Does it matter who drew it up? As a democratic government, we cannot ignore the decision of the rank and file of the people, even though we may disagree with it; in the fire of experience, applying the decree in practice, and carrying it out locally, the peasants will themselves understand where the truth lies. And even if the peasants continue to follow the Socialist-Revolutionaries, even if they give this party a majority in the Constituent Assembly, we shall still say, be it so. Experience is the best teacher and it will show who is right. Let the peasant solve this problem from one end and us from the other. Experience will bring us closer in the general stream of revolutionary creation, in the elaboration of new state forms. We must follow experience; we must allow complete freedom for the creative faculties of the masses. The old government, which was swept away by armed insurrection, tried to settle the land question with the help of the old tsarist bureaucracy, which remained intact. But instead of solving the question the bureaucracy fought the peasants. The peasants have learned something during the eight months of revolution; they want themselves to settle all questions concerning the land. Therefore we declare ourselves opposed to all amendments to this draft law. We want no details in it, for we are writing a decree, not a programme of action. Russia is great, and local conditions vary. We believe that the peasants will be able to solve the problem correctly, better than we could ourselves. Whether in our spirit, or in the spirit of the programme of the Socialist-Revolutionaries is not the point. The point is that the peasants should be firmly assured that there are no more landlords in the countryside, that they must themselves arrange their own lives.

DRAFT STATUTES ON WORKERS' CONTROL*

1) Workers' control of the production, warehousing, purchase and sale of all products and raw materials shall be introduced in all industrial, commercial, banking, agricultural and other enterprises employing not less than five workers and employees (together), or with a turnover of not less than 10,000 rubles per annum.

2) Workers' control shall be carried out by all the workers and employees in a given enterprise, either directly, if the enterprise is small enough to permit it, or through their elected delegates, who shall be elected immediately at general meetings, at which minutes of the elections shall be taken and the names of those elected communicated to the government and to the local Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies.

3) Unless permission is given by the elected delegates of the workers and employees, the closing of an enterprise or the cessation of work of state importance (see § 7), or any changes in processes, are absolutely prohibited.

4) The elected delegates shall have access to all books and documents and to all warehouses and stocks of materials, instruments and products, without exception.

5) The decisions of the elected delegates of the workers and employees are obligatory upon the owners of enterprises and can be annulled only by trade unions and congresses.

6) In enterprises of state importance all the owners and all the delegates of the workers and employees elected for the purpose of exercising workers' control are answerable to the state for the maintenance of the strictest order and discipline and for the protection of property. Persons guilty of neglect of duty, concealment of stocks, accounts, etc., shall be punished by the confiscation of the whole of their property and by imprisonment for a period of up to five years.

7) Enterprises of state importance shall be understood to comprise all enterprises working for defence purposes, or in any way connected with the production of articles necessary for the existence of the masses of the population.

8) More detailed regulations on workers' control shall be drawn up by the local Soviets of Workers' Deputies and by conferences of factory and workshop committees, and also by committees of employees, at general meetings of their delegates.

November 8-13 (October 26-31), 1917

FROM THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF THE RUSSIAN SOCIAL-DEMOCRATIC LABOUR PARTY (BOLSHEVIKS) *

To Comrades Kamenev, Zinoviev, Ryazanov and Larin

THE Central Committee has once already had occasion to deliver an ultimatum to the more prominent representatives of your policy (Kamenev and Zinoviev) demanding complete subordination to the decisions of the Central Committee and to its line and a complete renunciation of the sabotage of its work and of all disorganising activities.

By retiring from the Central Committee but remaining within the Party, the representatives of your policy assumed an obligation to submit to the decisions of the Central Committee. However, not confining yourselves to criticism within the Party, you are introducing indecision into the ranks of the fighters in an insurrection which is still in progress, and are continuing, in defiance of Party discipline, to set at naught, outside our Party—in the Soviets, the municipal bodies, the trade unions, etc.—the decisions of the Central Committee and are hindering its work.

In view of this, the Central Committee is obliged to reiterate its ultimatum and to call upon you either to give an immediate undertaking in writing to submit to the decisions of the Central Committee and to carry out its policy in all your actions, or to retire from all public Party activity and, pending the meeting of the Party Congress, to resign all responsible posts in the working class movement.

Refusal on your part to give one or the other of these undertakings will oblige the Central Committee to raise the question of your immediate expulsion from the Party.

November 18 (5) or 19 (6), 1917

FROM THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF THE RUSSIAN SOCIAL-DEMOCRATIC PARTY (BOLSHEVIKS)¹

To All Party Members and to All the Toiling Classes of Russia
COMRADES,

It is common knowledge that the Second All-Russian Congress of Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies has given a majority to the delegates of the Party of the Bolsheviks.

This fact is essential for an understanding of the recent victorious revolution in Petrograd, Moscow and the whole of Russia. Yet this fact is forgotten and ignored by the followers of the capitalists and their unwitting supporters, who are undermining the fundamental principle of the new revolution, namely, All power to the Soviets. There must be no other government in Russia than a Soviet government. The Soviet power has been won in Russia, and the transfer of government from one Soviet party to another is guaranteed without the necessity for a revolution, by a simple decision of the Soviets, simply by new elections of deputies to the Soviets. The Second All-Russian Congress of Soviets has given a majority to the Party of the Bolsheviks. Therefore, only a government formed by that Party will be a Soviet government. You are all aware that the Central Committee of the Party of the Bolsheviks, several hours prior to the formation of the new government, and before submitting the list of its members to the Second All-Russian Congress of Soviets, invited to its session three of the most prominent members of the group of Left Socialist-Revolutionaries, Comrades Kamkov, Spiro and Karelin, and invited them to join in the new government.* We extremely regret that the Left Socialist-Revolutionary comrades refused; we regard such a refusal as impermissible on the part of revolutionaries and champions of the toilers. We are ready at any moment to include Left

¹ See note to p. 412.*—Ed.

Socialist-Revolutionaries in the government, but we declare that, as the party that received the majority at the Second All-Russian Congress of Soviets, we are entitled and are obliged to form a government.

Everybody knows that the Central Committee of our Party submitted a purely Bolshevik list of People's Commissars to the Second All-Russian Congress of Soviets, and that the Congress approved this list for a purely Bolshevik government.

Hence the statements to the effect that the Bolshevik government is not a Soviet government are absolute lies, and are spread, and can be spread, only by the enemies of the people, the enemies of the Soviet power. On the contrary, now, after the Second All-Russian Congress of Soviets, and until the Third Congress is summoned, or until new elections to the Soviets take place, or until a new government is formed by the Central Executive Committee, only a Bolshevik government can be regarded as the Soviet government.

* *

Comrades, several members of the Central Committee of our Party and of the Council of People's Commissars—Kamenev, Zinoviev, Nogin, Rykov, Milyutin and a few others—yesterday, November 17 (4), resigned from the Central Committee of our Party, and the three last named from the Council of People's Commissars. In a large party like ours, notwithstanding the proletarian and revolutionary line of our policy, it is inevitable that individual comrades should be found who do not possess the firmness and determination required in the struggle against the enemies of the people. The tasks that now face our Party are indeed vast, the difficulties are enormous, and certain members of our Party who formerly occupied responsible posts flinched in face of the pressure of the bourgeoisie and fled from our ranks. The bourgeoisie and their supporters are jubilant over this fact and are maliciously rejoicing, prating of collapse and predicting the fall of the Bolshevik government.

Comrades, do not believe these lies. The comrades who have left us have acted like deserters, since they not only quitted the posts entrusted to them, but violated the direct decision of the Central Committee of our Party, which enjoined them to delay their resignation at least until a decision be taken by the Petrograd and Moscow Party organisations. We vigorously condemn this desertion. We are profoundly convinced that all class-conscious workers, soldiers and peasants, who belong to or who sympathise with our Party, will condemn the acts of the deserters with equal vigour.

But we declare that not for one minute, and not in one iota, can the desertion of certain individuals belonging to the leading ranks of our Party shake the unity of the masses who support our Party, and it therefore cannot shake our Party.

Remember, comrades, that two of the deserters, Kamenev and Zinoviev, acted as deserters and strike-breakers even before the insurrection in Petrograd, for they not only voted against the insurrection at the decisive meeting of the Central Committee on October 23 (10), 1917, but even after the decision had been taken by the Central Committee they addressed Party workers, agitating against the insurrection. It is common knowledge that at that time newspapers which fear to take the side of the workers and are inclined more to the side of the bourgeoisie (e.g., Novaya Zhizn), in common with the whole bourgeois press, raised the cry that our Party was disintegrating, that the insurrection was collapsing, and so on. But events swiftly refuted the lies and slanders of some and the doubts, waverings and cowardice of others. The storm they tried to raise around the efforts of Kamenev and Zinoviev to prevent the Petrograd insurrection proved to be a storm in a teacup, and the great enthusiasm of the masses, the great heroism of millions of workers, soldiers and peasants in Petrograd, in Moscow, at the front, in the trenches and in the villages, swept the deserters aside as easily as a railway train brushes splinters aside.

Shame, therefore, on all faint-hearts, waverers and doubters, on all who allow themselves to be intimidated by the bourgeoisie or who succumb to the outcries of its direct and indirect supporters. There is not the slightest hesitation among the mass of the workers and soldiers of Petrograd, Moscow and other places. Our Party stands solidly and firmly, like one man, in defence of the Soviet power, in defence of the interests of the toilers and first and foremost of the workers and poor peasants.

The chorus of bourgeois scribes and of those who allow themselves to be intimidated by the bourgeoisie accuse us of being uncompromising, of being irreconcilable, of refusing to share power with another party. That is not true, comrades. We have invited and continue to invite the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries to share the power with us. It is not our fault that they have refused. We began the negotiations, and, after the Second Congress of Soviets had dispersed, we made all kinds of concessions in the course of these negotiations, even to the extent of provisionally agreeing to admit representatives of a section of the Petrograd City Duma, that nest of Kornilovists, which will be the first to be wiped out by the people should the rascally Kornilovists, the darling sons of the capitalists and landlords, the Junkers, attempt once more to oppose the will of the people, as they did last Sunday in Petrograd, and as they would like to do again (as is proved by the exposure of the Purishkevich conspiracy and the documents seized on him yesterday, November 16 [3] *). But the gentlemen who stand behind the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries and are using them in the interests of the bourgeoisie interpreted our readiness to make concessions as weakness and presented us with new ultimatums. At the conference on November 16 (3) Messrs. Abramovich and Martov appeared and presented an ultimatum: there would be no negotiations until our government put a stop to the arrests and the suppression of the bourgeois newspapers.

Both our Party and the Central Executive Committee of the Congress of Soviets refused to accept this ultimatum, which obviously emanates from the supporters of Kaledin, the bourgeoisie, Kerensky and Kornilov. The conspiracy of Purishkevich and the appearance in Petrograd on November 18 (5) of a delegation from a division of the 17th Army Corps bringing threats of an advance 'on Petrograd' (a ridiculous threat, for the advance detachments of the Kornilovists were beaten and took to flight at Gatchina, while a large number of them have refused to act against the Soviets) have proved who were the real authors of the ultimatum of Abramovich and Martov and whom these people were really serving.

Therefore let the toilers remain confident and resolute! Never will our Party submit to the ultimatum of the minority in the Soviets, a minority that has allowed itself to be intimidated by the bourgeoisie and which in spite of its "good intentions" is virtually a puppet in the hands of the Kornilovists.

We stand firmly for the principle of the Soviet power, i.e., the power of the majority obtained at the last Congress of Soviets. We were willing, and remain willing, to share the power with the minority of the Soviets, provided that minority loyally and honestly undertake: to submit to the majority and carry out the programme approved by the whole Second All-Russian Congress of Soviets, consisting of gradual, but firm and undeviating measures towards socialism. But we shall not submit to any ultimatums of groups of intellectuals who are not backed by the masses, and who in actual fact are backed only by the Kornilovists, the Savinkovists, the Junkers, and so forth.

Therefore let the toilers remain confident and resolute! Our Party, the party of the Soviet majority, stands solid and united in defence of their interests, and, as heretofore, at the back of our Party stand the millions of the workers in the cities, the soldiers in the trenches and the peasants in the villages, resolved at all costs to bring about the triumph of peace and the triumph of socialism!

November 17-19 (46), 1917

TO THE POPULATION *

COMRADES—Workers, Soldiers, Peasants and all Toilers,

The workers' and peasants' revolution has finally triumphed in Petrograd and has dispersed and arrested the last remnants of the small number of Cossacks who were deceived by Kerensky. The revolution has triumphed in Moscow too. Before the troop trains dispatched from Petrograd could arrive, the Junkers and the other Kornilovists in Moscow had already signed terms of peace, namely, that the Junkers should be disarmed and the Committee of Public Safety dissolved.

News is arriving daily and hourly from the front and from the villages to the effect that the vast majority of the soldiers in the trenches and the peasants in the rural districts are supporting the new government and its laws, which provide for peace and the immediate transfer of the land to the peasants. The triumph of the revolution of the workers and peasants is guaranteed, for the majority of the people are already supporting it.

It is, of course, obvious that the landlords and capitalists and the higher-placed employees and officials, who are closely bound up with the bourgeoisie, in a word all the rich and the hangers-on of the rich, are meeting the new revolution with hostility, are resisting its victory, threatening to stop the functioning of the banks, injuring and stopping the work of various institutions, interfering with it and hindering it in every possible way, now directly, now indirectly. Every class conscious worker perfectly well understands that such resistance is inevitable; the Bolshevik Party press has pointed it out frequently. The toiling classes will not allow themselves to be intimidated even for a minute by this resistance, and will not be deterred one jot by the threats and strikes of the supporters of the bourgeoisie.

The majority of the people are with us. The majority of the toilers and the oppressed of the whole world are with us. Justice is on our side. Our victory is certain.

The resistance of the capitalists and the higher ranks of the employees will be smashed. Not a single person will be deprived of his property except by a specific law of the state providing for the nationalisation of the banks and the syndicates. This law is being drawn up. Not a single toiler or worker will lose a penny; on the contrary, he will receive assistance. The strictest accountability and control, the collection of taxes already established—the government does not desire to introduce any other measures.

On behalf of these just demands the vast majority of the people have rallied around the Provisional Workers' and Peasants' Government.

Comrades toilers, remember that you yourselves are now governing the state. Nobody will help you unless you unite and take all the affairs of the state into your own hands. Your Soviets are now the organs of state power, organs with full competence to decide all questions.

Rally around your Soviets. Consolidate them. Set about the work from below without waiting for anybody. Establish the strictest revolutionary order; mercilessly suppress all attempts at anarchy on the part of drunkards, hooligans, counter-revolutionary Junkers, Kornilovists and the like.

Introduce the strictest control over production and account of products. Arrest and hand over to the revolutionary court of the people everyone who dares to do injury to the cause of the people, whether by sabotaging (damaging, interfering with, or disorganising) production, or by concealing supplies of grain and food products, or by holding up consignments of grain, or by disorganising the railway, postal, telegraph and telephone services, or by any kind of resistance to the great cause of peace, the transfer of the land to the peasants and the establishment of workers' control over production and distribution.

Comrades workers, soldiers, peasants and all toilers! Put the entire power of government into the hands of your Soviets. Cherish and protect the land, grain, factories, implements, products and transport like the apple of your eye—all these are henceforth entirely yours, the property of the whole people. Gradually, with the consent and approval of the majority of the peasants, and on the basis of their practical experience and the experience of the workers, we shall march firmly and undeviatingly to the triumph of socialism, which will be consolidated by the advanced workers of the more civilised countries and which will bring the peoples a lasting peace and emancipate them from all forms of oppression and exploitation.

V. ULYANOV (LENIN)

Chairman of the Council of People's Commissars

November 18 (5), 1917
Petrograd

SPEECH ON THE AGRARIAN QUESTION

*Delivered at the Extraordinary Congress of Soviets of Peasants' Deputies, November 27 (14) 1917

PRESS REPORT

ACTING upon instructions of the Bolshevik fraction, Lenin delivered a speech setting forth the views of the Bolshevik Party on the agrarian question.

The party of Socialist-Revolutionaries, he said, has suffered defeat over the agrarian question, since it preached the confiscation of the landed estates, but refused to carry it into effect.

Landed proprietorship forms the basis of feudal oppression, and the confiscation of the landed estates is the first step of the revolution in Russia. But the land question cannot be settled apart from the other tasks of the revolution. A correct view of these problems can be derived from an analysis of the stages through which the revolution has passed. The first step was the overthrow of the autocracy and the establishment of the power of the bourgeoisie and the landlords. The interests of the landlords were closely interwoven with the interests of the bourgeoisie and the banks. The second stage was the consolidation of the Soviets and a policy of compromise with the bourgeoisie. The mistake of the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries was that at that time they failed to oppose the policy of compromise on the plea that the masses were not sufficiently educated. A party is the vanguard of a class, and its duty is to lead the masses, not to reflect the average state of mind of the masses. But in order to lead the vacillating, we must stop vacillating ourselves.

Comrades Left Socialist-Revolutionaries, in July a phase started in which the masses of the people began to break away from the policy of compromise, but to this very day the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries are stretching out a hand to the Avksentyevs, while offering the workers only a finger.* If compromise continues, the revolution is doomed. Only if the peasantry supports the workers can the problems of the revolution be solved. Compromise is an attempt on the part of the masses of the workers, peasants and soldiers to secure the satisfaction of their wants by means of reforms, by concessions on the part of capital, without a socialist revolution. But it is impossible to give the people peace and land without overthrowing the bourgeoisie, without socialism. It is the duty of the revolution to put an end to compromise, and to put an end to compromise means adopting the path of socialism.

Lenin went on to defend the instructions to the volost Committees  and spoke of the necessity of breaking with the leading organs, such as the army committees, the Executive Committee of the Peasants' Deputies, etc. We took our law on the volost Committees, he said, from the peasants. The peasants want land and the prohibition of hired labour; they want implements for the cultivation of the soil. And this cannot be obtained without overthrowing capital. We tell them: You want land; but the land is mortgaged and belongs to Russian and world capital. You are throwing down a challenge to capital, but are following a different path from us; but we are at one with you in that we are marching, and must march, towards the social revolution. As regards the Constituent Assembly, the speaker said that its work will depend on the mood of the country. But I say: Trust in the mood, but don't forget your rifles.

Lenin went on to deal with the question of the war. When he referred to the removal of Dukhonin and the appointment of Krylenko as Commander-in-Chief of the forces, there was laughter among the audience. It may be funny to you, he retorted, but the soldiers will condemn you for this laughter. If there are individuals here who think it funny that we removed a counter-revolutionary general and appointed Krylenko, who is against the general and has gone to conduct negotiations, we have nothing to say to those individuals. We have nothing in common with those who do not recognise the necessity of fighting the counter-revolutionary generals. We prefer to retire from power, if necessary go underground, rather than have anything to do with such people.

DRAFT RESOLUTION SUBMITTED TO THE EXTRAORDINARY CONGRESS OF SOVIETS OF PEASANTS' DEPUTIES ¹

THE Peasant Congress completely and wholeheartedly supports the Law (Decree) on the Land of November 8 (October 26), 1917, which was approved by the Second All-Russian Congress of Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies and promulgated by the Council of People's Commissars, acting as the Provisional Workers' and Peasants' Government of the Russian Republic. The Peasant Congress expresses its firm and inflexible determination to carry this law into effect, and calls upon all peasants unanimously to support it and immediately put it into practice themselves in the localities. It also calls upon the peasants to elect to all responsible posts and positions only people who have proved, not in word, but in deed, their complete devotion to the interests of the toiling and exploited peasants and their readiness and ability to defend those interests against every attempt at resistance on the part of the landlords and capitalists and their followers and supporters.

At the same time, the Peasant Congress expresses the conviction that the complete realisation of all the measures constituting the Land Law is possible only provided that the workers' socialist revolution, begun on November 7 (October 25), is successful; for only a socialist revolution is capable of securing the transfer of the land to the toiling peasantry without compensation, the confiscation of the farm property of the landlords, and the full protection of the interests of the agricultural wage labourers, as well as the immediate beginning of the abolition of the whole system of capitalist wage slavery, the just and systematic distribution of the products of agriculture and the products of industry among the regions and the inhabitants of the state, mastery over the banks (without which mastery over the land on the part of the people is unthinkable, even with the abolition of private property in land), the fullest possible aid by the state to the toilers and exploited, and so on.

¹ See note to p. 421.*—Ed.

Accordingly, the Peasant Congress, wholeheartedly supporting the revolution of November 7 (October 25), and supporting it for the very reason that it is a socialist revolution, expresses its inflexible determination to carry out by duly gradual stages, but without hesitation, measures for the socialist transformation of the Russian Republic.

An essential condition for the victory of the socialist revolution, which alone can guarantee the lasting success and complete realisation of the Land Law, is the closest alliance between the toiling and exploited peasantry and the working class—the proletariat—in all advanced countries. The whole structure and administration of the state, from top to bottom, must henceforth in the Russian Republic be based upon such an alliance. Rejecting each and every attempt, direct and indirect, open or covert, to return to the policy, condemned by experience, of compromise with the bourgeoisie and with those who carry out the policy of the bourgeoisie, such an alliance is alone capable of securing the triumph of socialism throughout the world.

November 28 (15), 1917

AN ALLIANCE BETWEEN THE WORKERS AND THE TOILING AND EXPLOITED PEASANTS *

A LETTER TO PRAVDA

TODAY, Saturday, December 1 (November 18), in the course of my speech at the Peasant Congress, I was publicly asked a question to which I forthwith replied. It is essential that this question and my reply should immediately be made known to all the reading public, for, while formally speaking only in my own name, I was in fact speaking in the name of the whole Bolshevik Party.

The matter was as follows.

Touching upon the question of an alliance between the Bolshevik workers and the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries, whom many peasants at present trust, I attempted to show in my speech that the alliance can be an "honest coalition," an honest alliance, for there is no radical divergence between the interests of the wage workers and the interests of the toiling and exploited peasants. Socialism is fully able to satisfy the interests of both. And only socialism can satisfy their interests. Hence the possibility and necessity for an "honest coalition" between the proletarians and the toiling and exploited peasantry. On the other hand, a "coalition" between the toiling and exploited classes on the one hand and the bourgeoisie on the other cannot be an "honest coalition" because of the fundamental divergence of interests of these classes.

Imagine, I said, that there will be in the government a majority of Bolsheviks and a minority of Left Socialist-Revolutionaries, or let us say, only one Left Socialist-Revolutionary, the Commissar for Agriculture. Could the Bolsheviks in such circumstances practise an honest coalition?

They could; for, while they are irreconcilable in their fight against the counter-revolutionary elements (including the Right Socialist-Revolutionaries and the defencists), the Bolsheviks would be obliged to abstain from voting on questions concerning purely Socialist-Revolutionary points in the land programme approved by the Second All-Russian Congress of Soviets. Such a point, for instance, would be the principle of equal land tenure and the redistribution of land among the small peasants.

By abstaining from voting on such a point the Bolsheviks would not in any way be changing their programme. For, given the triumph of socialism (workers' control over the factories, to be followed by their expropriation, the nationalisation of the banks, and the creation of a supreme economic council for the regulation of the whole economic life of the country), given that, the workers would be obliged to agree to the transitional measures proposed by the small toiling and exploited peasants, provided such measures were not detrimental to the cause of socialism. Kautsky, when he was still a Marxist (from 1899 to 1909) frequently admitted—I said—that the transitional measures to socialism cannot be identical in countries of large-scale and in countries of small-scale agriculture.

We Bolsheviks would be obliged to abstain when such a point was being voted in the Council of People's Commissars or in the Central Executive Committee, for, if the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries (and the peasants who support them) agreed to workers' control, to the nationalisation of the banks, etc., equal land tenure would be only one of the transitional measures to complete socialism. It would be absurd for the proletariat to impose such transitional measures; it is its duty, in the interests of the triumph of socialism, to give way to the small toiling and exploited peasants in the choice of these transitional measures, since they can do no harm to the cause of socialism.

Thereupon, a Left Socialist-Revolutionary (if I am not mistaken, it was Comrade Feofilaktov) asked me the following question:

"How would the Bolsheviks act if in the Constituent Assembly the peasants wanted to carry through a law on equal land tenure, while the bourgeoisie were opposed to the peasants and the decision therefore depended on the Bolsheviks?"

I replied: In such circumstances, when the cause of socialism would be assured by the introduction of workers' control, the nationalisation of the banks, etc., the alliance between the workers and the toiling and exploited peasants would oblige the party of the proletariat to vote for the peasants and against the bourgeoisie. The Bolsheviks, in my opinion, would be entitled when the vote was being taken to make a declaration of dissent, to record their non-agreement; but to hold back under such circumstances would be to betray their allies in the fight for socialism for the sake of a difference with them on a particular issue. Never would the Bolsheviks betray the peasants in such a situation. Equal land tenure, and like measures, cannot injure socialism, provided the power is in the hands of a workers' and peasants' government, provided workers' control has been established, the banks nationalised, a workers' and peasants' supreme economic organ created to direct (regulate) the whole of the economic life of the country, and so forth.

Such was my reply.

December 1 (November 18), 1917

SPEECH DELIVERED AT THE SECOND ALL-RUSSIAN CONGRESS OF PEASANTS' DEPUTIES,
DECEMBER 15 (2), 1917 *

COMRADES, at the last Extraordinary Congress of Peasants' Deputies I appeared as a member of the Bolshevik fraction and not as a member of the Council of People's Commissars. I appear in the same capacity now, for I consider it important that the opinion of the Party of the Bolsheviks should be known to this congress of peasants' deputies.

When I arrived here I heard a part of the speech of the last speaker, who, turning to me, told you that I wanted to disperse you at the point of the bayonet.  Comrades, Russia has grown beyond the point where any person can govern her. You know that from the moment the army turned their weapons for the conquest of freedom, from the moment it became possible for the peasants clad in soldier's uniform to meet and arrange matters with peasants not clad in soldier's uniform, from that moment there has been no force that can tame the will of the people, the will of the peasants and workers.

Comrades, I want to tell you how we understand the revolution of November 7 (October 25). Comrades, it has been stated here that a new wave of revolution may sweep the Soviets away. I say that cannot be. I am firmly convinced that the Soviets will never perish; that has been proved by the revolution of November 7 (October 25). The Soviets will never perish, for they were formed even in the first Revolution of 1905; they were formed after the February Revolution, and were formed not upon anybody's personal initiative, but by the will of the masses of the people, from below. There can be no limitations, no formalities here, for they have been formed by the will of the people, and the people are free to recall their representatives at any moment. The Soviets are superior to any parliament, they are superior to any Constituent Assembly. [Commotion and cries: That's a lie!] The Party of the Bolsheviks has always declared that the supreme body is the Soviets. That cannot be called a lie, because the revolutions which occurred in Europe and which overthrew the monarchy formed bourgeois republics with the help of Constituent Assemblies. Such a revolution as has taken place in our country has never occurred anywhere else before. It is said that the revolution of November 7 (October 25) created only "a Bolshevik government." I might say that there are not only Bolsheviks in the Council of People's Commissars. Those of you who remember the First Congress of Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies will know that the Bolsheviks were then in the minority; but, having learned by experience whither the policy of compromise would lead, the people at the Second Congress of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies gave a majority to the Party of the Bolsheviks. When they tell me, and shout from the hostile press, that bayonets may be directed against the Soviets, I simply laugh. The bayonets are in the hands of the workers, the soldiers and the peasants, and while in their hands they will never be directed against the Soviets. Let the counter-revolution turn the bayonets on the Soviets, they bear no terrors for them.

Passing to the question of the Constituent Assembly, I must say that the Constituent Assembly can help only if the people themselves are free to develop and build up a new life. And I ask you: Is that the case?

I am telling you what you all know: "Man is not made for the sabbath, but the sabbath for man." Comrades, you know how the elections to the Constituent Assembly took place. That is one of the most advanced methods of election, for it is not individuals who are elected, but representatives of parties. And that is a step forward, for revolutions are made by parties and not by individuals. When the elections to the Constituent Assembly took place there was only one party of Socialist-Revolutionaries, the party which has the majority in the Constituent Assembly. But that is not the case now.* You will perhaps say that the Bolsheviks also brought that about. No, comrades, that is a world-wide law. Always and everywhere, the people are slowly and painfully dividing into two camps: the camp of the dispossessed and down-trodden, the camp of those who are fighting for a brighter future for all the toilers, and the camp of those who in one way or another support the landlords and capitalists. When the elections took place the people did not elect those who expressed their will and their desires. You say that we have declared the whole Cadet Party enemies of the people. Yes, we have.¹ And thereby we expressed the will of the Second Congress of Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies. And now that we are on the threshold of peace and the cessation of the frightful slaughter that has lasted three years, we are convinced that it is the demand of all the toilers of all countries. The overthrow of imperialism in Europe is proceeding slowly and painfully, and imperialists in all countries will now see that the people are strong, and in their strength will overthrow all who stand in their way. We shall not be deterred when people who are organising revolt against the workers and peasants, against the Soviets, point with their other hand to the high mandate of the Constituent Assembly. In July we were told that we should be denounced as enemies of the people. And we answered, "Try it." If the bourgeois gentlemen and their followers had only tried to say that to the people openly! But they did not; they resorted to insinuation, slander and mud-slinging. When the bourgeoisie began the civil war (we witnessed it), they incited the Junkers to revolt. But we, the victors, were merciful to them, the vanquished. Ay, more, we even preserved their military honour. And now, when the Constituent Assembly is being convened, we say: We shall open the Constituent Assembly when four hundred of its members arrive. We see that the conspiracy of the Cadets is continuing, we see that they are organising a revolt against the Soviets in the interests of the moneybags, of greed and riches. We publicly denounce them as enemies of the people. At a time when the terms of peace will shortly be known, when we are about to have an armistice, when the members of the Land Committees are immune from arrest, when the landed estates will be confiscated, and when control will be established over the factories and workshops—at such a time they are conspiring against us, against the Soviets. We therefore declare that the party of the Cadets is a party of the bourgeoisie, that they are enemies of the people, and that we shall fight them.

¹ See note to p. 437.*—Ed.

DRAFT OF A MANIFESTO TO THE PEASANTRY FROM THE SECOND ALL-RUSSIAN CONGRESS OF PEASANTS' DEPUTIES ¹

THE Second All-Russian Peasant Congress earnestly appeals to the peasantry of all the nations and peoples of Russia to bend their mind and their will, the power of their numbers and their energy, in order to arouse the sleepers and to encourage the irresolute and, from every corner of the country, from every village and from every quarter of the large cities, to utter aloud, so that all may hear, their weighty and decisive word at this, perhaps the most serious and most responsible moment of the Great Russian Revolution.

Comrades peasants, we constitute the overwhelming majority of the population of our country. We are the vast mass of the toilers and the exploited. We are the vast mass of the fighters on behalf of the lawful and just demands of the toilers—first and foremost the demand for land—the fighters against all forms of oppression and exploitation on the part of both the landlords and the capitalists.

Comrades peasants, we are the vast mass of our army, to whose lot has fallen the inhuman suffering of more than three years of the war instigated by the tsars and the capitalists; to whose lot has also fallen the difficult but thankful and honourable role of being—together with the workers—vanguard fighters for freedom, land and peace, and for the complete emancipation of the toilers from all forms of oppression and exploitation.

Comrades peasants, consider our manifesto, our appeal, issued by the deputies of the peasants to the peasants of all the nations of Russia. Make known our appeal in every village and in every cottage; discuss it at every meeting and village assembly and in every peasant institution, without exception; and in the localities make your own firm and unshakable decisions. For it is on your decisions, on the decisions of the majority of the people, the decisions of the peasants themselves, that the fate of our native land mostly depends.

¹ See note to p. 428.*—Ed.

The fateful hour is approaching. The last fight is at hand. The whole country, all the nations of our republic, has been divided into two great camps. One camp is that of the landlords and capitalists, the rich and their servitors, the state dignitaries and their friends, the commanders of the nation and the supporters of the war.

The other camp is that of the workers and the toiling and exploited peasants, the poor people and their friends, the rank-and-file soldiers and the supporters of peace, the advocates of a heroic, decisive and bold revolutionary struggle for peace, a struggle in which no mercy will be shown to the oppressors of the people.

The struggle between these two camps has in certain parts of the country already assumed the form of open and direct civil war, a war of the Soviet armies against a small handful who are relying on the power of wealth, and who desire to overthrow the Soviet power, the power and government of the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies.

Comrades peasants, on your determined, unshakable and momentous word much will now depend: on it depends the cessation of this civil war; on it depends the possibility of the peaceful transfer in Russia of all the land to the toilers, without compensation; on it depends the triumph of socialism. Comrades peasants, rise like one man; lift up your voice; announce your demands; draw up your own Instructions in every village. You can make yourselves heard; you will compel them all to hear you!

Comrades peasants, you must in the first place declare your decided condemnation of those deputies to the Second All-Russian Peasants' Congress who broke away from the Congress. Condemn those splitters. Condemn the destroyers of the unity of the peasantry, the unity of the toiling people, the unity of the peasants and the workers. An outrageous crime has been committed by these splitters, these destroyers of the unity of the peasantry, these deserters to the camp of the rich, to the camp of the landlords and the capitalists. These people call themselves "Socialist-Revolutionaries" of the Right Wing and the Centre, the followers of Avksentyev and Chernov. They have betrayed the whole doctrine and programme of the Socialist-Revolutionaries; they have deserted to the enemies of socialism, to the throttlers of the revolution. They have broken with the loyal guardians of the doctrine, programme and demands of the Socialist-Revolutionaries, the party of the "Left Socialist-Revolutionary Internationalists," who have remained loyal to the interests of the toiling peasantry. They, these followers of Avksentyev and Chernov, have left the Second All-Russian Peasants' Congress and refused to submit to the decision of the majority of the peasants, in order that they may carry out the will of the wealthy and the capitalists against the peasants, in order to hinder the cause of peace, in order to prevent the immediate transfer of the land, without compensation, to the toiling people, and in order to preserve the policy of Avksentyev, Chernov, Maslov and their like, which is fatal to the peasants.

Utter your condemnation of these traitors to the cause of the peasants. By condemning them, you will save many of the weak and wavering, and you will save Russia from insane attempts at civil war. Insane, because, apart from shedding rivers of blood, they will change nothing; nothing in the world can break the unanimous decision of the workers, soldiers and peasants, the decision of the Second All-Russian Congress of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies and of the Second All-Russian Congress of Peasants' Deputies.

Utter your condemnation of these traitors to the cause of the peasants. Let every village express its confidence in the decisions of these two Congresses, the Congresses of the Soviets of the workers, the soldiers and the peasants. Let every village recall from the Constituent Assembly those deputies from the Socialist-Revolutionary Party, or from the Peasants' Soviets and institutions, who have not loudly proclaimed, and proved in practice, their wholehearted recognition of these decisions.

Comrades peasants, you all know that opponents of the decisions of the Second All-Russian Congress of Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies and of the Second All-Russian Congress of Peasants' Deputies could be elected, and were elected, from the peasants to the Constituent Assembly only by misrepresentation. These people, who often call themselves Socialist-Revolutionaries, actually defrauded the peasants, who as yet did not know the truth regarding the policy of Avksentyev, Chernov and Maslov, a policy of making concessions to the landlords, of compromising with the capitalists, and of arresting the members of the local peasants' Land Committees.* These Avksentyevs, Maslovs and Chernovs deceived the peasants, since the general lists of the Socialist-Revolutionary Party were compiled before October 30 (17), whereas the truth became revealed to the whole of Russia only after October 30 (17).

It was the Second All-Russian Congress of Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies that on November 7-8 (October 25-26), 1917, revealed the truth to the whole of Russia. The truth was again revealed by the Soviet power, the Soviet government, which was the first to publish the shameful secret treaties, which was the first to start a real revolutionary struggle for peace, which was the first to show in action what that struggle should be, and which has already succeeded in obtaining an armistice on one of the fronts.

The truth was revealed by the Soviet government when it issued the Decree on the Land, thereby unconditionally placing itself on the side of the peasantry and eliminating all possibility of outside interference with the complete power of the peasants in the localities.

The truth has been revealed by the Second All-Russian Peasants' Congress, which was the first to expose to the peasants in a detailed resolution the shameful role of the Executive Committee of the Avksentyevs and Chernovs.¹ The Congress will close on December 21 (8), having begun on December 13 (November 30), 1917.

Comrades peasants, you thus see that when the lists were drawn up on October 30 (17) and during the elections to the Constituent Assembly on November 25 (12) the peasants could not yet have known the truth as to the land and peace, and could not yet distinguish their friends from their enemies, from the wolves in sheep's clothing. You can see that it is only by fraud that those Socialist-Revolutionaries who oppose the decisions of the Second All-Russian Congress of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies and of the Second All-Russian Congress of Peasants' Deputies can speak in the name of the peasants.

¹ I.e., the Central Executive Committee of the All-Russian Soviet of Peasants' Deputies which existed prior to the Second Congress of those deputies.—Ed.

Comrades peasants, do not allow blood to be shed because of this fraud! Raise your voices in determined protest against those who have withdrawn from the Second All-Russian Congress of Peasants' Deputies. Draw up your Instructions in every gubernia, in every uyezd, in every volost and in every village; utter your protest against those who have deserted the Congress; publish the names of the local deputies of the peasants to the Constituent Assembly who have not adhered to the decisions of these Congresses, and demand that these deputies shall resign from the Constituent Assembly; for it is only by deceiving the people that they can pretend to have been elected by the people.

Comrades peasants, the Constituent Assembly must express the will of the people. Those who have withdrawn from the Second All-Russian Congress of Peasants' Deputies, who thwarted its will, who caused a split among the peasants and who deserted the peasants for the rich, are not the elected of the people. They are traitors, and there is no place for them in the Constituent Assembly. They bring, not peace nor land for the toilers: they bring the people the insane and criminal indignation of the rich against the Soviet power. The people will not tolerate deceit. The people will not allow their will to be frustrated. The people will not surrender the Soviet power to please the rich. The people will not allow the rich to lacerate the cause of peace they have espoused, the cause of the transfer of the land to the toilers, immediately, without exception, without compensation.

Only two alternatives face the country:

Either a civil war against the Soviet power on the part of the Kaledinites, the Cadets, the Kornilovists (and their concealed allies, the Avksentyevs, the Chernovs and the Maslovs), a bloody war, a hopeless war for its initiators, a war that will not deprive the Soviets of power, but will only engender greater fury, be the cause of greater sacrifices, the shedding of more blood, greater delay in carrying through the great socialist reforms, and greater famine in the grainless provinces;

Or honest recognition of the truth which is apparent to all, namely, that the opponents of the decisions of the Second All-Russian Congress of Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies and of the Second All-Russian Congress of Peasants' Deputies could have secured election to the Constituent Assembly by the peasants only by fraud, and that therefore such deputies must submit to new elections.

There is no other alternative. Either the bloody annihilation of the rich, the Avksentyevs, the Chernovs and the Maslovs, or their consent to new elections of peasants' deputies to the Constituent Assembly as soon as the peasant opponents of the decisions of the two Soviet Congresses, the Second All-Russian Congress of Soviets of Workers' and Peasants' Deputies and the Second All-Russian Congress of Soviets of Peasants' Deputies, utter their opinion in the Constituent Assembly.

The decision lies with you, comrades peasants!

The final decision lies with you.

The resolute utterance of all the peasants, the Instructions of all the peasants from the localities, can bring peace to the whole country, to all the nations of Russia, can stop the civil war, can guarantee not a sham, but a genuine Constituent Assembly, can accelerate and facilitate the cessation of the war by a just peace and the transfer of the land to the toilers, can strengthen the alliance between the peasants and the workers and hasten the triumph of socialism.

The decision lies with you, comrades peasants! Long live the transfer of the land to the toilers! Long live peace! Long live socialism!

THE SECOND ALL-RUSSIAN CONGRESS OF PEASANTS' DEPUTIES

SPEECH ON THE CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY AND ON THE ARREST OF THE MEMBERS OF THE CADET PARTY

*Delivered to the All-Russian Central Executive Committee at its Session of December 14 (1), 1917 **

EXTRACT FROM THE MINUTES

CONSIDERED apart from the circumstances of the class war, which has become a civil war, we have not yet known of a more perfect institution for determining the will of the people than the Constituent Assembly. But we must not indulge in fancies. The Constituent Assembly will have to function under the circumstances of a civil war. It was the Kaledin bourgeois elements that started the civil war.

After attempting to drag out the insurrection in Moscow, after the unsuccessful attempt on the part of Kerensky to bring troops against Petrograd, after the fruitless attempt to organise the counter-revolutionary commanding ranks of the army, they are now endeavouring to organise an uprising on the Don. The attempt is hopeless, since the toiling Cossacks are opposed to the Kaledinites.

Replying to the charge of persecuting the Cadet Party, Lenin declared that the class struggle cannot be regarded detached from one's political opponents. When it is said that the Cadet Party is not a strong group, it is not true. The Cadet Central Committee is the political general staff of the bourgeois class. The Cadets have absorbed the propertied classes: elements have fused with them that stood to the Right of the Cadets. They all support the Cadet Party.

We are being called upon to convene the Constituent Assembly in the form in which it was first planned. No, I beg your pardon. It was planned against the people. We made the revolution in order to have guarantees that the Constituent Assembly shall not be used against the people, and in order that these guarantees shall be in the hands of the government. Our decree states clearly and unambiguously when the Constituent Assembly will be convened. It contains an exact answer to that question. Do not indulge in thought-reading; we are concealing nothing. We said that we shall convene the Constituent Assembly when four hundred members arrive. We are not to blame that the elections took place later than the appointed time. In certain localities the Soviets themselves appointed later election dates. Since the elections were held on various dates, it became necessary to determine how many deputies are required in order to open the Constituent Assembly. There was an attempt to take advantage of the fact that the number is not indicated in the law, in order to convene the Constituent Assembly irrespective of the number of deputies present. What would be the position of a government that permitted such a thing? The Soviet government was right in decreeing the number of deputies required in order that the Constituent Assembly might be deemed properly constituted. That is what the Soviet government did. Those who are not in agreement should criticise the decree. But when instead of criticism we hear insinuations and guesses, we brush them aside.

When a revolutionary class is fighting the propertied classes and the latter show resistance, that resistance must be crushed. And we shall crush the resistance of the propertied classes, using all those means with the help of which they crushed the proletariat. No other means have been invented.

You said the bourgeoisie should be isolated. But the Cadets, under cover of a formally democratic demand, the demand for a Constituent Assembly, in fact started civil war. They say: We want to sit in the Constituent Assembly and at the same time organise civil war. And to that you reply by talk of isolation.

We are not merely persecuting violators of formalities: we are bringing direct political accusations against a political party. That is the way the French revolutionaries acted. It is our reply to those peasants who elected without knowing whom they were electing. Let the people know that the Constituent Assembly is being summoned not quite in the way Kerensky intended. We have introduced the right of recall,* and the Constituent Assembly will not be quite the thing the bourgeoisie planned. While only a few days remain before the Constituent Assembly is summoned, the bourgeoisie is organising civil war, intensifying sabotage and undermining the armistice. We shall not let ourselves be deceived by formal slogans. They would like to sit in the Constituent Assembly and at the same time organise civil war. Let them give their reasoned arguments in refutation of our accusation against the Cadet Party: let them prove that the Cadet Party is not the general staff of the civil war, an obviously hopeless war that is drenching the country in blood. . . . Comrade Steinberg has not attempted to prove that. He has forgotten all that was revealed regarding the contacts between the Cadets and Kornilov; it was not we, but Chernov, our political opponent, who revealed those contacts.* We are advised to catch the little fellow. We shall not disguise our political accusation against the general staff of a whole class by hunting for particular individuals. . . .

Lenin then dealt with the rejoinder that the Bolsheviks were also proclaimed enemies of the people. They threatened to proclaim us enemies of the people, he said, but they did not. They did not dare. We said to them at that time: Well, if you can, try it; try to tell the people that the Bolshevik Party, as a party, as a tendency, is the enemy of the people. They did not dare; they hunted particular individuals, they conducted a campaign of calumny. We said: You cannot proclaim us enemies of the people; you have not a single objection in principle to bring against the Bolsheviks; all you can do is to spread calumnies. Our accusation against the Cadet Party puts an end to the petty manoeuvres of political struggle. We shall tell the people the truth. We shall tell the people that their interests are superior to the interests of any democratic institution. We must not return to the old prejudices, which subordinate the interests of the people to formal democracy. The Cadets cry, All power to the Constituent Assembly. But what they mean in fact is, All power to Kaledin. The people must be told that, and the people will approve our action.

NOTE TO F. E. DZERZHINSKY *

COMRADE DZERZHINSKY,

In connection with your report today regarding the methods of fighting saboteurs and counter-revolutionaries.

Would it not be possible to put through a decree like the following?

On Fighting Counter-Revolutionaries and Saboteurs

The bourgeoisie, the landlords and all the rich classes are making desperate efforts to undermine the revolution, the aim of which is to safeguard the interests of the workers, the toiling and exploited masses.

The bourgeoisie is prepared to commit the most heinous crimes; it is bribing the outcast and degraded elements of society and organising them for pogroms. The supporters of the bourgeoisie, particularly among the higher employees, bank officials, and so on, are sabotaging, and are organising strikes in order to thwart the government's measures for the realisation of socialist reforms. They have even gone so far as to sabotage food distribution, thereby menacing millions of people with famine.

Special measures are necessary to fight the counter-revolutionaries and saboteurs. In virtue of this necessity, the Soviet of People's Commissars decrees:

1) Persons belonging to the wealthy classes (i.e., with incomes of 500 rubles or more per month, and owners of urban real estate, stocks and shares, or money amounting to over 1,000 rubles), and also all employees of banks, joint stock companies, state and public institutions, shall within three days present to their house committees written statements in three copies signed with their own signatures and indicating their address, income, place of employment and their occupation.

2) The house committees shall countersign these statements, retain one copy and send one copy to the city administration and another to the People's Commissariat for Home Affairs (address:).

3) Persons guilty of non-observance of the present law (failing to make statements, giving false information, etc.) and members of house committees infringing the regulations governing the collection, preservation and presentation of these statements to the institutions mentioned above shall be liable to be fined a sum not exceeding 5,000 rubles for each such infringement, to imprisonment up to one year, or to be sent to the front, depending on the offence.

4) Persons sabotaging the work of, or declining to work in, banks, state and public institutions, joint stock companies, railways, etc., shall be liable to similar punishment.

5) As a first step towards universal labour service, it is decreed that the persons referred to in §1 shall be obliged, first, constantly to carry with them a copy of the above-mentioned declaration certified by the house committees and by their chiefs or elected officials (shop committees, food committees, railway committees, employees' trade unions, etc.); the certificates must indicate what public service or work is being performed by the individual in question, or whether he is living with his family as a non-ablebodied member thereof, etc.

6) Secondly, such persons shall be obliged to acquire within one week from the issue of the present law consumers'-workers' books (specimen attached), in which shall be entered their weekly income and expenditures, and in which entries shall be made, certified by the proper committees or institutions, regarding the public duties performed by the individual in question.

7) Persons who do not come under §1 shall present to their house committees a statement in one copy of their income and place of employment and shall carry with them another copy of this statement certified by the house committee.

DRAFT DECREE ON THE SOCIALISATION OF THE NATIONAL ECONOMY *

THE critical food situation and the danger of famine created by the speculation and sabotage of the capitalists and government officials, as well as the general state of disorganisation, makes it essential to adopt extraordinary revolutionary measures for combating this evil.

In order that all citizens of the state, and particularly the toiling classes, shall take up the fight against this evil immediately and comprehensively, and address themselves to the proper organisation of the economic life of the country, stopping at nothing and acting in the most revolutionary manner, under the leadership of their Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies, the following regulations are decreed:

Draft Decree on the Nationalisation of the Banks and the Adoption of the Measures Necessitated Thereby

1) All joint stock companies are declared to be the property of the state.

2) Members of boards and directors of joint stock companies, and also all shareholders belonging to the wealthy classes (i.e., possessing property exceeding 5,000 rubles, or an income exceeding 500 rubles per month) are obliged to continue the systematic conduct of the affairs of these enterprises, observe the law on workers' control, present all shares to the State Bank and submit to the local Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies weekly reports of their activities.

3) State loans, foreign and domestic, are hereby annulled.

4) The interests of small holders of bonds and shares, i.e., holders belonging to the toiling classes of the population, shall be fully protected.

5) Universal labour service is hereby introduced: all citizens of both sexes between the ages of sixteen and fifty-five shall be obliged to perform work assigned to them by the local Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies, or by other organs of the Soviet power.

6) As a first step towards the introduction of universal labour service, it is decreed that persons belonging to the wealthy classes (see §2) shall be obliged to possess, and make proper entries in, consumers'-workers' books, or workers' budget books, which must be presented to the competent workers' organisations or to the local Soviets and their organs for weekly notations of the performance of the work undertaken.

7) For the purpose of proper control and distribution of foodstuffs and other necessary products, every citizen of the state shall be obliged to join a consumers' society. The food boards, committees of supply, and similar organisations, and also the railway and transport unions, shall, under the guidance of the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies, exercise control over the due observation of the present law. Persons belonging to the wealthy classes, in particular, shall be obliged to perform any work assigned to them by the Soviets in the sphere of organising and conducting the affairs of the consumers' societies.

8) The railway employees' unions shall be charged with the duty of urgently drawing up and immediately carrying into effect extraordinary measures for the better organisation of transport, particularly as regards the transport of foodstuffs, fuel and other items of prime necessity, being guided by the instructions and orders firstly of the Soviet of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies and then of the bodies empowered for this purpose by them and by the Supreme Council of National Economy. Similarly, upon the railway unions, working in conjunction with the local Soviets, shall devolve the duty of energetically combating petty food profiteers and mercilessly suppressing speculation, if necessary resorting to revolutionary measures for this purpose.

9) Workers' organisations, unions of office employees and the local Soviets shall immediately set about placing closed and demobilised enterprises, and also unemployed workers, on the performance of useful work and the production of articles of necessity, finding orders, raw materials and fuel. While under no circumstances postponing the performance of this work, and while likewise proceeding to the exchange of country products for city products without awaiting special instructions on the subject from superior bodies, the local unions and Soviets shall be strictly guided by the orders and instructions of the Supreme Council of National Economy.

10) Members of the wealthy classes shall be obliged to keep all their monetary possessions in the State Bank and its branches, or in the savings banks, withdrawing not more than 100-125 rubles per week (as shall be established by the local Soviets) for living purposes; withdrawals for purposes of production and trade shall be made only with a written certificate of the organs of workers' control.

For the purpose of supervising the due realisation of this present law, regulations shall be drawn up providing for the exchange of the present currency bills for new currency bills. Persons guilty of fraud on the state and the people shall be liable to the confiscation of all their property.

11) Violators of the present law, saboteurs and government officials who go on strike, and also speculators, shall be liable to a similar penalty, and to imprisonment, or to dispatch to the front, or to compulsory labour. The local Soviets and their organs shall with all due speed decide upon the most revolutionary measures to be taken for combating these real enemies of the people.

12) The trade unions and other organisations of the toilers, acting in conjunction with the local Soviets, and with the participation of reliable persons recommended by Party and other organisations, shall organise mobile groups of inspectors to supervise the carrying into effect of the present law, to inspect the quantity and quality of work performed and to bring to trial before the revolutionary courts persons guilty of violating or evading this law.

DRAFT DECREE ON CONSUMERS' COMMUNES¹

THE war, caused by the conflict among the capitalists for the division of the spoils of depredation, has resulted in untold ruin, which has been intensified by criminal speculation and the lust for gain, particularly among the wealthy classes. Hundreds of thousands and even millions of people are as a result suffering the tortures of hunger and unemployment. The need for adopting extraordinary measures in order to aid the starving and to wage merciless war on speculation has induced the workers' and peasants' government to enact the following regulations as a law of the Russian Republic:

Every citizen of the state shall belong to a local consumers' society (village, volost, hamlet, section of town, street, etc.).

The grouping of families in the consumers' societies shall be voluntary, except for the proviso that not less than two-thirds of the number of families in each society must belong to the non-wealthy classes (i.e., workers, peasants not employing hired labour, and so on).

Apart from the purchase and distribution of products, every consumers' society shall engage in the sale of local products. The boards of the consumers' societies shall set up committees of supply, and no transportation of products shall be permitted without the written sanction of the appropriate committee of supply.

Existing consumers' societies are hereby nationalised and shall be obliged to admit to membership the whole population of the localities in which they are situated, without exception.

Private individuals may, if they so desire, purchase products not in their local but in the central stores, but only on condition that a corresponding entry is made in the book of the local consumers' society.

¹ See note to p. 442.*—Ed.

The transportation, as well as the purchase and sale, of products without a certificate of the committees of supply shall be punishable by the confiscation of the whole of the property of the offender, by imprisonment for a period of not less than six months and by sentence of compulsory labour.

Certificates sanctioning the transportation or the purchase and sale of products shall be drawn up in duplicate and signed by not less than three members of the board of the appropriate committee of supply; one copy shall be preserved in the files of the board.

Each certificate must state from which and to which consumers' society the products are being consigned.

Telegraph offices shall give priority to the telegrams of the committees of supply.

All committees of supply shall act under the control and in accordance with the instructions of the local Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies.

Every individual shall be entitled to acquire at his consumers' society any product, without any limitation whatsoever, except for such regulations as may be established for limiting the import of products from abroad.

Products produced for sale must be delivered to the local committee of supply at prevailing prices, except in cases when fixed prices are established by law. Money due in payment for products shall be entered to the account of the owner in the local (village, volost, city, factory or other) branch of the People's Bank.

Every Soviet of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies shall be obliged to appoint a group of controllers, auditors and instructors to assist the population in the formation of consumers' societies (committees of supply) and for the supervision of their accounts and of all their operations.

Instructions regarding the conduct of the accounts and correspondence of the committees of supply will be issued separately.

January 7-10, 1918

THESES ON THE CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY *

1) The demand for the convocation of a Constituent Assembly was a perfectly legitimate part of the programme of revolutionary Social-Democracy, because in a bourgeois republic a Constituent Assembly represents the highest form of democracy, and because the imperialist republic, with Kerensky at its head, in creating a parliament, was preparing to manipulate the elections and to commit a number of infringements of democracy.

2) While demanding the convocation of a Constituent Assembly, revolutionary Social-Democracy has, from the very beginning of the Revolution of 1917, repeatedly emphasised that a republic of Soviets is a higher form of democracy than the ordinary bourgeois republic with a Constituent Assembly.

3) For the transition from the bourgeois to the socialist order, for the dictatorship of the proletariat, a republic of Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies is not only the form of a higher type of democratic institution (as compared with the ordinary bourgeois republic crowned with a Constituent Assembly), but is the only form capable of securing the most painless transition to socialism.

4) The convocation of the Constituent Assembly in our revolution on the basis of lists submitted at the end (middle) of October 1917 is taking place amidst conditions which preclude the possibility of the elections to this Constituent Assembly faithfully expressing the will of the people in general and of the toiling masses in particular.

5) First, proportional representation results in a faithful expression of the will of the people only when the party lists correspond to the real division among the people actually in accordance with the party groupings which are reflected in those lists. Here, however, as is well known, the party which between

May and October had the largest number of adherents among the people, and especially among the peasantry, viz., the Socialist-Revolutionary Party, presented joint lists for the Constituent Assembly at the end (middle) of October 1917, but split after the elections to the Constituent Assembly, before it was convened.

For this reason, there is not, nor can there be, even formal correlation between the will of the mass of the electors and the composition of the Constituent Assembly.

6) Second, a still more important, not formal, nor legal, but a social-economic class source of the discrepancy between the will of the people and especially of the toiling classes, on the one hand, and the composition of the Constituent Assembly, on the other, is the circumstance that the elections to the Constituent Assembly took place at a time when the overwhelming majority of the people could not yet know the whole extent and significance of the October Soviet proletarian and peasant revolution, which began on November 7 (October 25), 1917, i.e., after the lists of candidates for the Constituent Assembly had been submitted.

7) The October Revolution, which captured power for the Soviets, and which wrested political domination from the hands of the bourgeoisie and transferred it to the hands of the proletariat and poorest peasantry, is passing, under our very eyes, through successive stages of development.

8) It began with the victory of November 6-7 (October 24-25) in the capital, when the Second All-Russian Congress of Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, the vanguard of the proletarians, and of the most politically active section of the peasantry, gave a majority to the Bolshevik Party and put it in power.

9) Then, in the course of November and December, the revolution spread to the entire army and the peasantry, and manifested itself, first of all, in the dismissal of the leading bodies (army committees,* gubernia and peasant committees, the Central Executive Committee of the All-Russian Soviet of Peasants' Deputies, etc.), which expressed the superseded compromising stage of the revolution, its bourgeois and not proletarian stage, and which were inevitably bound to disappear as a result of the pressure of the lower and broader masses of the people, and the election of new ones.

10) This mighty movement of the exploited masses for the reorganisation of the leading bodies of their organisations has really not yet ended—end (middle) of December 1917—and the Railwaymen's Congress,* which is still in session, represents one of its stages.

11) Hence, the grouping of the class forces in Russia in the course of the class struggle is in fact assuming an essentially different form in November and December 1917 from the one that could be reflected in the party lists of candidates for the Constituent Assembly that were submitted at the end (middle) of October 1917.

12) Recent events in the Ukraine (partly also in Finland and White Russia, as well as in the Caucasus) similarly reveal a regrouping of the class forces which is taking place in the process of the struggle between the bourgeois nationalism of the Ukrainian Rada, the Finnish Diet, etc., on the one hand, and the Soviet power, the proletarian and peasant revolution in each of these national republics, on the other.

13) Lastly, the civil war which was started by the counter-revolutionary rebellion of the Cadet-Kaledinites against the Soviet authorities, against the workers' and peasants' government, has finally brought the class struggle to an issue and has destroyed all chances of settling the very acute problems which history has set before the peoples of Russia, and more particularly before the Russian working class and peasantry, in a formal democratic way.

14) Only the complete victory of the workers and peasants over the bourgeois and landlord rebellion (which found expression in the Cadet-Kaledinite movement), only the ruthless military suppression of this rebellion of the slaveowners can really safeguard the proletarian and peasant revolution. The course of events and the development of the class struggle in the revolution has resulted in the slogan "All power to the Constituent Assembly"—which ignores the gains of the workers' and peasants' revolution, which ignores the Soviet power, which ignores the decisions of the Second All-Russian Congress of Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, of the Second All-Russian Congress of Peasants' Deputies, etc.—becoming in fact the slogan of the Cadets and the Kale-dinites, and of their abettors. It is becoming clear to the entire people that this slogan means in fact a struggle for the overthrow of the Soviet power, and that the Constituent Assembly, if it disagreed with the Soviet power, would inevitably be doomed to political extinction.

15) Among the particularly acute problems of national life is the problem of peace. A real revolutionary struggle for peace was commenced in Russia only after the victory of the revolution of November 7 (October 25), and the first fruits of this victory were the publication of the secret treaties, the conclusion of an armistice, and the beginning of open negotiations for a general peace without annexations and indemnities.

Only now have the broad masses of the people an opportunity of seeing in operation a policy of revolutionary struggle for peace, and of studying its results.

At the time of the elections to the Constituent Assembly the masses of the people had no such opportunity.

Clearly, then, from this point of view also, a discrepancy between the composition of the Constituent Assembly and the real will of the people on the question of terminating the war is also inevitable.

16) The result of all the above-mentioned circumstances is that the Constituent Assembly, elected according to party lists compiled before the proletarian and peasant revolution, under the rule of the bourgeoisie, must inevitably clash with the will and interests of the toiling and exploited classes which on November 7 (October 25) began the socialist revolution against the bourgeoisie. Naturally, the interests of this revolution are higher than the formal rights of the Constituent Assembly, even if those formal rights were not undermined by the absence in the Constituent Assembly Law of a provision recognising the right of the people to recall its deputies and hold new elections at any moment.

17) Every attempt, direct or indirect, to regard the question of the Constituent Assembly from a formal and legal point of view, within the limits of ordinary bourgeois democracy, and ignoring the class struggle and civil war, is treachery to the cause of the proletariat, and is the adoption of the bourgeois point of view. It is the bounden duty of the revolutionary Social-Democrats to warn all and sundry against this error, into which a few Bolshevik leaders, * who have not been able to appreciate the significance of the October uprising and the tasks of the dictatorship of the proletariat, have fallen.

18) The only chance of securing a painless solution of the crisis which has arisen as a result of the discrepancy between the elections to the Constituent Assembly and the will of the people, as well as the interests of the toiling and exploited classes, is to enable the people as early as possible to exercise the right to elect anew the members of the Constituent Assembly, and for the Constituent Assembly to associate itself with the law passed by the Central Executive Committee concerning this new election, for the Constituent Assembly to proclaim unreservedly that it recognises the Soviet power, the Soviet revolution, its policy on the questions of peace, the land, and workers' control, and that it resolutely joins the camp of the enemies of the Cadet-Kaledinite counter-revolution.

19) Unless these conditions are created, the crisis in connection with the Constituent Assembly can be settled only in a revolutionary way, by the most energetic, rapid, firm and determined revolutionary measures on the part of the Soviet power against the Cadet-Kaledinite counter-revolution, no matter what slogans and institutions (even membership of the Constituent Assembly) this counter-revolution may screen itself with. Every attempt to tie the hands of the Soviet power in this struggle would be tantamount to aiding and abetting the counter-revolution.

December 24 (11) or 25 (12), 1917

DRAFT DECLARATION OF THE RIGHTS OF THE TOILING AND EXPLOITED PEOPLE ¹

THE Constituent Assembly resolves:

I

1) Russia is hereby declared a republic of Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies. All power centrally and locally belongs to the Soviets.

2) The Russian Soviet Republic shall be constituted on the principle of a free union of free nations, as a federation of Soviet national republics.

II

Making it its fundamental aim to abolish all forms of exploitation of man by man, to put a complete end to the division of society into classes, mercilessly to crush the resistance of the exploiters, to establish a socialist organisation of society and to achieve the victory of socialism in all countries, the Constituent Assembly further resolves:

1) Private property in land is hereby abolished. All land, together with all structures, farm property, and other appurtenances of agricultural production, is declared to be the property of the toiling people.

2) The Soviet laws on workers' control and on the Supreme Council of National Economy are hereby confirmed with the object of guaranteeing the power of the toiling people over the exploiters, and as a first step towards the complete transformation of the factories, workshops, mines, railways, and other means of production and transport into the property of the workers' and peasants' state.

¹ See note to p. 447.* --Ed.

3) The passing of all the banks into the possession of the workers' and peasants' state is hereby confirmed as one of the conditions for the emancipation of the toiling masses from the yoke of capitalism.

4) Universal labour service is hereby instituted with the object of abolishing the parasitic sections of society.

5) In order to guarantee sovereign power for the toiling masses, and in order to remove all possibility of the restoration of the power of the exploiters, the arming of the toilers, the creation of a socialist Red Army of workers and peasants and the complete disarming of the propertied classes are hereby decreed.

III

1) Expressing its firm determination to wrest mankind from the clutch of finance capital and imperialism, which have in this most criminal of wars drenched the world in blood, the Constituent Assembly declares its complete adherence to the policy of the Soviet power of tearing up the secret treaties, organising widespread fraternisation between the workers and peasants of the warring armies, and achieving at all costs and by revolutionary means a democratic peace among the nations, without annexations and indemnities, and on the basis of the self-determination of nations.

2) With the same purpose in view, the Constituent Assembly insists on a complete break with the barbarous policy of bourgeois civilisation, which has built the well-being of the exploiters of a few chosen nations on the enslavement of hundreds of millions of toiling people in Asia, in the colonies in general, and in the small countries.

The Constituent Assembly welcomes the policy of the Council of People's Commissars, which has proclaimed the complete independence of Finland, commenced the evacuation of troops from Persia and declared freedom of self-determination for Armenia.*

3) The Constituent Assembly regards the Soviet law on the cancellation of the loans issued by the governments of the tsar, landlords and bourgeoisie as a first blow to international bank and finance capital, and expresses its conviction that the Soviet government will firmly pursue this path until the international workers' revolt against the yoke of capital has completely triumphed.

IV

Having been elected on the basis of party lists drawn up prior to the October Revolution, when the people were still not in a position to rise en masse against the exploiters, when they still did not realise the full strength of the resistance shown by the latter in defence of their class privileges, and when they had not yet addressed themselves to the practical task of building a socialist society, the Constituent Assembly considers that it would be fundamentally wrong, even from a formal point of view, to set itself up against the Soviet power.

In point of fact, the Constituent Assembly considers that now, when the people are fighting the last fight against the exploiters, there can be no place for exploiters in any of the organs of government. The power must be vested solely and entirely in the toiling masses and their authorised government—the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies.

Supporting the Soviet power and the decrees of the Council of People's Commissars, the Constituent Assembly considers that its own duty must be limited to establishing a fundamental basis for the socialist reconstruction of society.

At the same time, with the object of creating a really free and voluntary, and therefore firm and stable, union of the toiling classes of all the nations of Russia, the Constituent Assembly limits its own duty to the establishment of the fundamental principles of a Federation of Soviet Republics of Russia, while leaving it to the workers and peasants of each nation to decide independently at their own sovereign Soviet Congress whether they shall participate in the federal government and in the other federal Soviet institutions, and on what terms.

Early part of January 1918

THE DISSOLUTION OF THE CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY ¹

Speech Delivered to the All-Russian Central Executive Committee, January 19 (6), 1918

COMRADES, the collision that has occurred between the Soviet power and the Constituent Assembly arose out of the whole course of the Russian revolution, which was confronted by the unprecedented task of reconstructing society on socialist lines. After the events of 1905 there could be no doubt that tsarism was at its last gasp. Only the backwardness and benightedness of the peasants saved it from the abyss. The Revolution of 1917 was marked on the one hand by the fact that the bourgeois imperialist party transformed itself under the pressure of events into a republican party.* On the other hand, there sprang up democratic organisations, the Soviets, such as were formed in 1905, for even at that time the Socialists realised that the organisation of these Soviets was creating something great, something new and unprecedented in the history of world revolution. The Soviets, created solely by the initiative of the people, are a form of democracy without parallel in any other country of the world.

The revolution evolved two forces: the union of the masses for the purpose of overthrowing tsarism, and the organisations of the toiling people. When I hear the enemies of the October Revolution exclaim that the ideas of socialism are unfeasible and utopian, I usually put to them a plain and simple question: What in their opinion, I ask, are the Soviets? What gave rise to these organisations of the people, which have no precedent in the history of the development of world revolution? Not one of them has been able to give a precise answer to this question. Defending the bourgeois system by inertia, they oppose these powerful organisations, the formation of which has never before been witnessed in any revolution in the world. All who are fighting the landlords are joining forces with the Soviets of Peasants' Deputies. The Soviets embrace all who, not wishing to stand idle, are devoting themselves to creative work. They have spread their network over the whole country, and the denser this network of Soviets of the people, the less will it be possible to exploit the representatives of the toiling people. For the existence of the Soviets is incompatible with the welfare of the bourgeois system. That is the source of all the contradictions among the representatives of the bourgeoisie, who are fighting our Soviets solely in their own interests.

¹ See note to p. 447.*—Ed.

The transition from capitalism to a socialist system entails a long and bitter struggle. Having overthrown tsarism, the Russian revolution was bound to go farther: it could not stop at the victory of the bourgeois revolution; for the war, and the untold sufferings it caused the exhausted peoples, created a soil favourable for the outbreak of the social revolution. Nothing, therefore, is more ludicrous than the assertion that the subsequent development of the revolution, and the revolt of the masses that followed, were caused by a party, by an individual, or, as they vociferate, by the will of a "dictator." The fire of revolution broke out solely because of the incredible sufferings of Russia, and of the conditions created by the war, which sternly and inexorably faced the toiling people with the alternative: either a bold, desperate and fearless step, or ruin—death from starvation.

And the fire of revolution was reflected in the creation of the Soviets—the mainstay of the revolution of labour. The Russian people took a gigantic leap—from tsarism to the Soviets. That is an irrefutable, an unparalleled fact. While the bourgeois parliaments of all countries and states, confined within the bounds of capitalism and private property, have never on any occasion supported a revolutionary movement, the Soviets, having lit the fire of revolution, imperatively command the people to fight, to take everything into their own hands, and to organise themselves. Doubtless, in the process of development of the revolution called forth by the power of the Soviets errors and blunders of all kinds will be committed. But everybody knows that revolutionary movements are always and inevitably accompanied by temporary chaos, destruction and disorder. . . . Bourgeois society is also a war, also a shambles; and it was this circumstance that called forth and accentuated the conflict between the Constituent Assembly and the Soviets. Those who point out that, while at one time we defended the Constituent Assembly, we are now "dispersing" it are not expressing a grain of sense, but are merely uttering pompous and meaningless phrases. For at one time, as compared with tsarism and the republic of Kerensky, we considered the Constituent Assembly to be better than their famous organs of power; but as the Soviets sprang up they, of course, as revolutionary organisations of the whole people, became incomparably superior to any parliament in the world. This fact I emphasised as early as last April. By fundamentally demolishing bourgeois and landlord proprietorship and by facilitating the final upheaval which is sweeping away all relics of the bourgeois system, the Soviets impelled us on to the path that is leading the people to mould their own life. We have taken up this great work of construction, and it is well that we have taken it up. Of course, the socialist revolution cannot be immediately presented to the people in a clean, neat and impeccable form; it will inevitably be accompanied by civil war, sabotage and resistance. Those who assert the contrary are either liars or bigots. The events of May 3 (April 20), when the people, without any directions from "dictators" or parties, came out independently and solidly against the government of compromisers, demonstrated even then the weakness and instability of the foundations of the bourgeoisie. The masses sensed their power, and for their sake there began that famous game of ministerial leapfrog, the object of which was to fool the people. But the people very soon saw through the game, particularly after Kerensky, both his pockets stuffed with predatory secret treaties with the imperialists, began to move the armies for an offensive. Gradually the activities of the compromisers became obvious to the deceived people, whose patience began to be exhausted. The result was the October Revolution. The people learned by experience, having suffered torture, executions and wholesale shootings. It is vain for the hangmen to assert that the Bolsheviks, or certain "dictators," are responsible for the revolt of the toilers. That is being proved by the schism that is taking place in the depths of the masses at congresses, meetings, conferences, and so forth. The assimilation of the October Revolution by the people is not yet complete. This revolution has shown in practice how the people must proceed to transfer the land, the natural resources, the means of transport and production, to the workers' and peasants' state. Our cry was, All power to the Soviets; it is for this we are fighting. The people wanted the Constituent Assembly summoned, and we summoned it. But they sensed immediately what this famous Constituent Assembly really represented. And now we have carried out the will of the people, which is, All power to the Soviets. We shall break the backs of the saboteurs. When I came from the Smolny, that fount of life and vigour, to the Taurida Palace,* I felt as though I were in the company of corpses and lifeless mummies. They drew on all their available resources in order to fight socialism, they resorted to violence and sabotage, they even turned knowledge—the great pride of humanity—into a means of exploiting the toiling people. But although they thereby somewhat hindered the march towards the socialist revolution, they were not and never will be able to stop it. For the power of the Soviets is too mighty; they have begun ruthlessly to smash the old, outworn foundations of the bourgeois system, not with gloved hands, but in a blunt proletarian and peasant fashion.

To hand over power to the Constituent Assembly would again be compromising with the malignant bourgeoisie. The Russian Soviets place the interests of the toiling masses far above the interests of treacherous compromise disguised in a new garb. A musty spirit of antiquity breathed in the speeches of those superannuated politicians, Chernov and Tseretelli, who continued tediously to whine for the cessation of civil war. But as long as Kaledin exists, and as long as behind the slogan "All power to the Constituent Assembly" is concealed the slogan "Down with the Soviets," civil war is inevitable. For nothing in the world will induce us to surrender the Soviet power! . . . And when the Constituent Assembly again revealed its readiness to postpone all the painfully urgent problems and tasks that were placed before it by the Soviets, we told the Constituent Assembly that they must not be postponed for one single moment. And by the will of the Soviet power the Constituent Assembly, which has refused to recognise the power of the people, is being dissolved. The Ryabushinskys have lost their stakes; their attempts at resistance will only accentuate and provoke a new outbreak of civil war.

The Constituent Assembly is dissolved. The Soviet revolutionary republic will triumph, no matter what the cost. . . .

January 19 (6), 1918

DRAFT DECREE ON THE DISSOLUTION OF THE CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY ¹

AT its very inception the Russian revolution created Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies, as the mass organisation of the toiling and exploited classes and as the only organisation capable of leading the struggle of these classes for their complete political and economic emancipation.

During the whole of the first period of the Russian revolution the Soviets multiplied, grew and gained in strength. Experience taught them to discard illusions of compromise with the bourgeoisie and the deceptive forms of bourgeois-democratic parliamentarism, and brought them to the practical conclusion that the emancipation of the oppressed classes was impossible unless they abandoned these parliamentary forms and every form of compromise. Such was the October Revolution, which transferred the entire power to the Soviets.

The Constituent Assembly, elected on the basis of lists drawn up prior to the October Revolution, was an expression of the old relation of political forces, which existed when the compromisers and the Cadets were in power. When the people at that time voted for the candidates of the Socialist-Revolutionary Party they were not in a position to choose between the Right Socialist-Revolutionaries, the supporters of the bourgeoisie, and the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries, the supporters of socialism. Hence the Constituent Assembly, which was to have been the crown of the bourgeois parliamentary republic, could not but become an obstacle in the path of the October Revolution and the Soviet power.

The October Revolution, by handing power over to the Soviets and, through the Soviets, to the toiling and exploited classes, aroused the desperate resistance of the exploiters. In the process of crushing this resistance the revolution proved itself to be the beginning of the socialist revolution. The toiling classes learned by experience that the old bourgeois parliamentarism had outlived itself and was entirely incompatible with the task of achieving socialism. They learned that not national institutions, but only class institutions (such as the Soviets are), were capable of breaking the resistance of the possessing classes and of laying the foundations of a socialist society. To relinquish at this stage any particle of the power of the Soviets, the Soviet republic won by the people, for the sake of bourgeois parliamentarism and the Constituent Assembly, would be a step backward and would mean the complete collapse of the October workers' and peasants' revolution.

¹ See note to p. 447.*—Ed.

Owing to the circumstances mentioned above, the majority in the Constituent Assembly, when it met on January 18 (5), was found to belong to the party of the Right Socialist-Revolutionaries, the party of Kerensky, Avksentyev and Chernov. It was only natural that this party should refuse to discuss the absolutely clear, precise and unambiguous proposal of the supreme organ of the Soviet power, the Central Executive Committee of the Soviets, to approve the programme of the Soviet power, to approve the Declaration of the Rights of the Toiling and Exploited People¹ and to recognise the October Revolution and the Soviet power. Thereby the Constituent Assembly severed all ties with the Soviet republic of Russia. The withdrawal from this Constituent Assembly of the fractions of the Bolsheviks and the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries, who now patently represent the overwhelming majority in the Soviets and enjoy the confidence of the workers and the majority of the peasants, became inevitable.

The Right Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik parties are in fact carrying on outside the walls of the Constituent Assembly a most bitter struggle against the Soviet power, openly calling in their press for its overthrow and characterising as arbitrary and unlawful the crushing of the resistance of the exploiters by the toiling classes, which is essential in the interests of emancipation from exploitation. They are supporting the saboteurs, the servitors of capital, and are even going to the length of undisguised appeals for terrorism, which indeed certain "unidentified groups" have already begun to practise. It is obvious that under such circumstances the remaining part of the Constituent Assembly would only have served as a screen for the struggle of the counter-revolutionaries to overthrow the Soviet power.

¹ See pp. 452-54 in this volume.—Ed.

Accordingly, the Central Executive Committee resolves:

The Constituent Assembly is hereby dissolved.

January 19 (6), 1918

THE ELECTIONS TO THE CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY AND THE DICTATORSHIP OF THE PROLETARIAT *

IN the volume of articles entitled A Year of the Russian Revolution, 1917-18 (Moscow, 1918, Moscow Publishing House Zemlya i Volya), published by the Socialist-Revolutionaries, there is an extremely interesting article by N. V. Svyatitsky entitled "The Results of the Elections to the All-Russian Constituent Assembly (Introduction)." The author gives figures for 54 of the electoral districts out of a total of 79.

The author's investigations embrace practically every gubernia of European Russia and Siberia. The following were omitted: Olonets, Esthonia, Kaluga, Bessarabia, Podolsk, Orenburg, Yakutsk and the Don.

We shall first quote the general results cited by N. V. Svyatitsky and then proceed to discuss the political conclusions that follow from them.

I

In November 1917, in 54 districts, 36,262,560 votes were cast in all. The author himself gives the figure 36,257,960, distributed over seven regions (together with the army and navy), but an addition of the figures he quotes for the individual parties gives the total I have indicated.

The results for the individual parties were as follows: the Russian Socialist-Revolutionaries received 16,500,000 votes, or, together with the Socialist-Revolutionaries of the other nationalities (Ukrainian, Mussulman, etc.), 20,900,000, or 58 per cent.

The Mensheviks obtained 668,064 votes, and if we add the analogous groups of Narodni-Socialists (312,000), the Yedinstvo (25,000), the Co-operators (51,000), the Ukrainian Social-Democrats (95,000), the Ukrainian Socialists (507,000), the German Socialists (44,000) and the Finnish Socialists (14,000), we arrive at a total of 1,700,000.

The Bolsheviks obtained 9,023,963 votes.

The Cadets received 1,856,639 votes. If we add the Alliance of Landowners (215,000), the "Right Groups" (292,000), the Old Believers (73,000), the nationalist groups: Jews (550,000), Mus-sulmans (576,000), Bashkirs (195,000), Letts (67,000), Poles (155,000), Cossacks (79,000), Germans (130,000), White Rus-sians (12,000)—and miscellaneous groups and organisations (418,000), we obtain a total for the landlord and bourgeois parties of 4,600,000.

We know that during the whole period of the revolution, from February to October 1917, the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks formed a bloc. Moreover, the whole course of events during this period, and since, has definitely shown that these two parties together represent the petty-bourgeois democrats, who false-ly imagine themselves to be and call themselves, just as do all the parties of the Second International, Socialists.

By adding together the three main groups of parties which participated in the elections to the Constituent Assembly, we obtain the following result:

Proletarian party (Bolsheviks)	9,020,000	25%
Petty-bourgeois democratic parties (Socialist-Revolu- tionaries, Mensheviks, etc.)	22,620,000	62%
Landlord and bourgeois parties (Cadets, etc.)	4,620,000	13%
Total	36,260,000	100%

Let us now cite the figures for the various regions,¹ as given by N. V. Svyatitsky:

¹ The author's division of Russia into regions is not quite the usual one: Northern: Archangel, Vologda, Petrograd, Novgorod, Pskov, Livonia; Central Industrial: Vladimir, Kostroma, Moscow, Nizhni-Novgorod, Ryazan, Tula, Tver, Yaroslavl; Volga and Black-Earth: Astrakhan, Voronezh, Kursk, Orel, Penza, Samara, Saratov, Simbirsk, Tambov; Western: Vitebsk, Minsk, Mo-ghilev, Smolensk; Upper Urals: Vyatka, Kazan, Perm, Ufa; Siberia: Tobolsk, Tomsk, Altai, Yenisei, Irkutsk, Trans-Baikal, Amur; Ukraine: Volynia, Eka-terinoslav, Kiev, Poltava, Taurida, Kharkov, Kherson, Chernigov.

Region	S.R.'s (Russian)	VOTES POLLED					Total
		Per cent	Bolsheviks	Per cent	Cadets	Per cent
Northern	1,140,000	38	1,177,200	40	393,000	13	2,975,100
Central Industrial Volga and Black- Earth	1,987,900	38	2,305,600	44	550,200	10	5,242,500
Western	4,733,900	70	1,115,600	16	267,000	4	6,764,300
Eastern Urals ...	1,242,100	43	1,282,200	44	48,100	2	2,961,000
Siberia	1,547,700	43 (62 ¹)	443,900	12	181,300	5	3,583,500
Ukraine	2,094,800	75	273,900	10	87,500	3	2,786,700
Army and Navy .	1,878,100	25 (77 ²)	754,000	10	277,500	4	7,581,300
	1,885,100	43	1,671,300	38	51,900	1	4,363,600

From these figures it will be seen that at the time of the elections to the Constituent Assembly the Bolsheviks were the party of the proletariat, while the Socialist-Revolutionaries were the party of the peasantry. In the purely peasant regions of Great Russia (Volga and Black-Earth, Siberia, and the Eastern Urals) and in the Ukraine the Socialist-Revolutionaries obtained from 62 to 77 per cent of the votes. In the industrial regions the Bolsheviks enjoyed superiority over the Socialist-Revolutionaries. This superiority is minimised in the regional figures given by N. V. Svyatitsky, since he has lumped together highly industrial districts with districts that are but slightly industrial or not at all. For instance, the figures given by Svyatitsky according to gubernias, showing the strength of the Socialist-Revolutionary, Bolshevik and Cadet parties and of the national and other groups, reveal the following.

In the Northern Region the superiority of the Bolsheviks appears to be negligible—40 per cent as against 38 per cent. But this region embraces both non-industrial districts (the gubernias of Archangel, Vologda, Novgorod and Pskov) where the Socialist-Revolutionaries predominated, and industrial districts: Petrograd proper—Bolsheviks 45 per cent (according to number of votes polled), Socialist-Revolutionaries 16 per cent; Petrograd Gubernia—Bolsheviks 50 per cent, Socialist-Revolutionaries 26 per cent; Livonia—Bolsheviks 72 per cent, Socialist-Revolutionaries 0 per cent.

¹ The figure 62 per cent is arrived at by Svyatitsky by adding the Musoulman and Chuvash Socialist-Revolutionaries.

² I obtain the figure 77 per cent by adding the Ukrainian Socialist-Revolutionaries.

In the gubernias of the Central Industrial Region the results were: Moscow Gubernia—Bolsheviks 56 per cent, Socialist-Revolutionaries 25 per cent; the Moscow capital district—Bolsheviks 50 per cent, Socialist-Revolutionaries 8 per cent; Tver Gubernia—Bolsheviks 54 per cent, Socialist-Revolutionaries 39 per cent; Vladimir—Bolsheviks 56 per cent, Socialist-Revolutionaries 32 per cent.

How ridiculous, be it noted in passing, in the face of such facts, is the assertion that the Bolsheviks were supported and are still supported by a "minority" of the proletariat! And such assertions we hear from both the Mensheviks (668,000 votes, and with Transcaucasia another 700,000-800,000 votes, as against 9,000,000 votes cast for the Bolsheviks) and from the social-traitors of the Second International.

II

How then could such a miracle as the victory of the Bolsheviks have occurred, when the Bolsheviks received only one-quarter of the votes, while the petty-bourgeois democrats, in coalition with the bourgeoisie, obtained three-quarters of the votes? For it would be simply ridiculous to deny the victory now, when the Entente—the almighty Entente—has for two years been lending aid to every enemy of the Bolsheviks.

The fact is that the savage political hatred of the vanquished, all the followers of the Second International included, prevents them even from seriously considering so interesting a historical and political problem as the reasons for the victory of the Bolsheviks. The fact is that the "miracle" is a miracle only from the point of view of the vulgar petty-bourgeois democracy, the full profundity of whose ignorance and prejudice is exposed by this question and the answer to it.

From the point of view of the class struggle and of socialism, which the Second International has abandoned, the answer to the question is indisputable.

The Bolsheviks triumphed primarily because they had the support of the overwhelming majority of the proletariat, among them the most class conscious, energetic and revolutionary section, the true vanguard of this advanced class.

Let us take the two capitals, Petrograd and Moscow. In these two cities a total of 1,765,100 votes were cast in the elections to the Constituent Assembly, of which the Socialist-Revolutionaries polled 218,000, the Bolsheviks 837,000, and the Cadets 515,400.

Notwithstanding the ardent genuflections of the petty-bourgeois democrats who call themselves Socialists and Social-Democrats (the Chernovs, Martovs, Kautskys, Longuets, MacDonalds and Co.) before the altar of the goddesses of "equality," "universal suffrage," "democracy," "pure democracy" and "consistent democracy," the economic and political fact of the inequality of town and country cannot be effaced.

It is a fact inevitable under capitalism in general, and in the transition from capitalism to communism in particular.

Under the conditions of the present historical era, the town cannot be the equal of the country and the country cannot be the equal of the town. The town will inevitably lead the country. The country will inevitably follow the town. The only question is, which class of the "town classes" will succeed in leading the country, will achieve this aim, and what forms this leadership of the town will take.

In November 1917 the Bolsheviks had the vast majority of the proletariat behind them. The party that competed with them for the support of the proletariat, the Menshevik Party, was utterly beaten (9,000,000 votes as against 1,400,000, if we add to the 668,000 the 700,000-800,000 votes of Transcaucasia). It was beaten in a struggle that had lasted fifteen years (from 1903 to 1917), that had tempered, enlightened and organised the vanguard of the proletariat, and forged it into a genuine revolutionary vanguard. The first revolution, 1905, paved the way for further development; it determined in practice the relation between the two parties and was a dress rehearsal for the great events of 1917-19.

The petty-bourgeois democrats who call themselves the "Socialists" of the Second International prefer to evade serious historical questions by uttering honeyed phrases on the advantages of the "unity" of the proletariat. These honeyed phrases help them to forget the historical fact that opportunism had been accumulating within the working class movement in the period 1871-1914. They forget or do not want to think of the causes of the collapse of opportunism in August 1914 and of the split in international Socialism during the years 1914-17.

Unless the revolutionary section of the proletariat is thoroughly and seriously trained to eject and suppress opportunism, it is absurd even to think of a dictatorship of the proletariat. This lesson of the Russian revolution must be rubbed into the leaders of the German "Independent" Social-Democratic Party, the French Socialists, and so forth, who would now like to wriggle out of the situation by paying lip service to the dictatorship of the proletariat.

Furthermore, the Bolsheviks had behind them not only the majority of the proletariat, and not only the revolutionary vanguard of the proletariat, which had been tempered in a long and stubborn struggle against opportunism. They had, if one may use a military term, the advantage of powerful "striking forces" in the capitals.

To have an overwhelming superiority of forces at the decisive moment and at the decisive point is a "law" not only of military success, but also of political success, especially in that bitter, seething war of the classes known as revolution.

The capitals, and the large commercial and industrial centres generally (in Russia these conceptions were coincident, but that is not always the case), to a considerable extent decide the political fate of a people—provided, of course, the centres are adequately supported by the rural forces in the localities, even if that support may not be immediately forthcoming.

In both capitals, in both of the most important commercial and industrial centres of Russia, the Bolsheviks possessed an overwhelming and decisive superiority of forces. Here we had almost four times as many votes as the Socialist-Revolutionaries. We had more than the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Cadets put together. Furthermore, our opponents were disintegrated, for the "coalition" of the Cadets with the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks (in Petrograd and Moscow the Mensheviks polled only 3 per cent of the votes) had been utterly discredited in the eyes of the toiling masses. There could be no question at that time of any real unity of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks with the Cadets against us.¹ As we know, even the leaders of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks, who were a hundred times closer to the idea of a bloc with the Cadets than the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik workers and peasants, even those leaders were thinking of (and bargained with us for) a coalition with the Bolsheviks without the Cadets.*

¹ It is interesting to note the unity of the party of the proletariat, revealed by the facts quoted above, compared with the extreme disunity of the parties of the petty bourgeoisie and the party of the bourgeoisie.

We fought for the capitals in October and November 1917 with certainty of success, because we had an overwhelming superiority of forces and were thoroughly prepared politically (both as regards the concentration, training, testing, and tempering of the Bolshevik "armies," and as regards the disintegration, disablement, disruption and demoralisation of the "armies" of the "enemy").

And thus, having the possibility, by a sudden and decisive blow, of seizing both the capitals, both the economic and political centres of the whole capitalist state machine, despite the savage resistance of the bureaucrats and the "intelligentsia," despite sabotage and so forth, and with the aid of the central apparatus of state power, we were in a position to prove in practice to the non-proletarian toiling masses that the proletariat is their sole reliable ally, their sole friend and leader.

III

But before passing to this, the most important question of the relation of the proletariat to the non-proletarian toiling masses, we must first dwell on the question of the army.

In the imperialist war the army absorbed the very flower of the national forces. And while the opportunist scum of the Second International (not only the social-chauvinists, i.e., the Scheidemanns and Renaudels, who became direct advocates of "national defence," but also the "Centrists") by their words and deeds helped to strengthen the subordination of the army to the leadership of the imperialist brigands of both the German and the Anglo-French groups, the genuine proletarian revolutionaries never forgot the words uttered by Marx in 1870: "The bourgeoisie will teach the proletariat the use of arms." Only traitors to socialism, both the Austro-German and the Anglo-Franco-Russian, could advocate "national defence" in the imperialist war, i.e., a predatory war on both sides; but the proletarian revolutionaries from the very beginning (August 1914) devoted all their attention to revolutionising the army, to using it against the imperialist bourgeois bandits, to transforming an unjust and predatory war between two groups of imperialist plunderers into a just and legitimate war of the proletarians and oppressed toiling masses in every country against their "own" national bourgeoisie.

The traitors to socialism did nothing during the years 1914-17 to prepare to use the armies against the imperialist governments of every nation.

The Bolsheviks from August 1914 on worked for this end in all their propaganda, agitation and illegal organisational work. Of course, the traitors to socialism, the Scheidemanns and Kautskys of all nations, on this account ranted about the "demoralisation" of the army by Bolshevik propaganda; but we are proud of having fulfilled our duty in demoralising the forces of our class enemy and in winning away from him the armed masses of the workers and peasants for the struggle against the exploiters.

The results of our work were evident also in the elections to the Constituent Assembly in November 1917, in which the army in Russia also voted.

Here are the main results of the voting, as given by N. V. Svyatitsky:

NUMBER OF VOTES CAST IN THE ELECTIONS TO THE CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY
IN NOVEMBER 1917 BY THE ARMY AND NAVY

	S.R.'s	Bolsheviks	Cadets	National and Other Groups	Total
Northern Front	240,000	480,000	?	60,000 ²	780,000
Western Front	180,600	635,400	16,700	125,200	976,000
South-Western Front .	402,900	300,100	13,700	290,600	1,007,400
Rumanian Front	679,400	167,000	21,400	260,700	1,128,600
Caucasian Front	360,000	60,000	?	—	420,000
Baltic Fleet	—	(120,000 ¹)	—	—	(120,000 ¹)
Black Sea Fleet	22,200	10,800	—	19,500	52,500
Total	1,885,100	1,671,300 (120,000 ¹)	51,800 + ?	756,000	4,364,500 + (120,000 ¹)
		1,791,300			4,484,500

¹ The figures are approximate: two Bolsheviks were elected. N. V. Svyatitsky reckons 60,000 votes for each representative. That is why I take 120,000.

² It is not stated which of the parties received the 19,500 votes of the Black Sea Fleet. The remaining figures in this column apparently refer almost entirely to the Ukrainian Socialists, since ten Ukrainian Socialists and one Social-Democrat (i.e., Menshevik) were elected.

The totals are: Socialist-Revolutionaries 1,885,100 votes, Bolsheviks 1,671,300 votes. If to the latter be added the 120,000 (approximate) votes of the Baltic Fleet, we obtain for the Bolsheviks a total of 1,791,300 votes.

Hence the Bolsheviks received only slightly less than the Socialist-Revolutionaries. ●

In October and November 1917, therefore, the army was already one-half Bolshevik.

And but for that we could not have triumphed.

And while we had half the votes in the army in general, we enjoyed an overwhelming superiority on the fronts which were nearest to the capitals, or not too far distant from the capitals. If the Caucasian front be excluded, the Bolsheviks enjoyed a general superiority over the Socialist-Revolutionaries, while on the Northern and Western fronts the Bolsheviks polled more than 1,000,000 votes, as against 420,000 votes polled by the Socialist-Revolutionaries.

Hence, in the army too the Bolsheviks in November 1917 already possessed the political "striking force" which guaranteed them an overwhelming superiority of forces at the decisive point at the decisive moment. Since the Bolsheviks had the overwhelming superiority on the Northern and Western fronts, while on the other fronts, more remote from the centre, the Bolsheviks had both the time and the opportunity to win the peasants away from the Socialist-Revolutionary Party (of which we shall speak later), the possibility of the army's opposing the October Revolution of the proletariat and the seizure of political power by the proletariat was out of the question.

IV

On the basis of the data of the elections to the Constituent Assembly, we have analysed three of the conditions which made for the triumph of Bolshevism: 1) an overwhelming majority of the proletariat; 2) nearly half the votes in the army; 3) an overwhelming superiority of forces at the decisive moment at the decisive points, namely, in the capitals and in the armies at the fronts nearest to the capitals.

But these conditions would have resulted only in the most shortlived and uncertain of victories had the Bolsheviks not succeeded in winning over the majority of the non-proletarian toiling masses, and wresting them away from the Socialist-Revolutionary and other petty-bourgeois parties.

That is the essential point.

And the chief reason why the "Socialists" (read petty-bourgeois democrats) of the Second International cannot understand the dictatorship of the proletariat is that they fail to realise that the power of the state in the hands of one class, the proletariat, can become and should become an instrument for winning over the non-proletarian toiling masses to the side of the proletariat, an instrument for wresting these masses away from the bourgeoisie and the petty-bourgeois parties.

Imbued as they are with petty-bourgeois prejudices, and forgetting what is most essential in the teachings of Marx on the state, the "Socialists" of the Second International regard the power of the state as something sacrosanct, an idol, the resultant of formal voting, the absolute of "consistent democracy" (and similar nonsense). They do not see that the power of the state is simply an instrument which different classes can use, and must use (and know how to use) in their own class interests.

The bourgeoisie used the power of the state as an instrument of the capitalist class against the proletariat and against all the toilers. This was the case even in the most democratic bourgeois republics. But the traitors to Marxism "forgot" this fact.

The proletariat (having assembled sufficiently powerful political and military "striking forces") must overthrow the bourgeoisie and deprive it of the power of the state, so as to wield this instrument for its own class purposes.

And what are the class purposes of the proletariat?

To crush the resistance of the bourgeoisie.

To "neutralise" the peasantry and, as far as possible, to win them—or at least the majority of the toiling, non-exploiting section of the peasantry—over to the side of the proletariat.

To organise large-scale machine production with the factories and means of production expropriated from the bourgeoisie in general.

To build up socialism on the ruins of capitalism.

The opportunists, including the Kautskians, are "teaching" the people a mockery of the teachings of Marx: the proletariat, forsooth, must first gain a majority with the help of universal suffrage; then, having gained this majority, it must take over the power of the state; and, finally, on the basis of this "consistent" (or "pure," as it is called now) democracy, it must proceed to organise socialism.

We, on the other hand, declare, on the basis of the teachings of Marx and the experience of the Russian revolution, that the proletariat must first overthrow the bourgeoisie and conquer the power of the state, and then use the power of the state, i.e., the dictatorship of the proletariat, as an instrument of its class in order to gain the sympathy of the majority of the toilers.

* * *

In what way can the power of the state in the hands of the proletariat become an instrument in the class struggle of the latter to establish its influence over the non-proletarian toiling masses, to win them over to the side of the proletariat, and to wrest them away from the bourgeoisie?

In the first place, the proletariat can achieve this aim not by restarting the old machinery of state power, but by smashing it to atoms and not leaving a stone of it standing (heedless of the howls of the panic-stricken respectable citizens and of the threats of the saboteurs). It must then create a new state apparatus, an apparatus which is adapted for the dictatorship of the proletariat and for the struggle of the latter against the bourgeoisie for the support of the non-proletarian toiling masses. This new apparatus is not somebody's invention, but grows out of the class struggle of the proletariat, as that struggle grows in width and depth. This new apparatus of state power, this new type of state power, is the Soviet power.

The Russian proletariat, immediately it conquered the state power, in the course of a few hours dissolved the old state machine (which, as Marx pointed out, had in the process of centuries become adapted to serving the class interests of the bourgeoisie, even in the most democratic of republics) and handed over the entire power to the Soviets. Only the toilers and exploited were admitted to the Soviets, while exploiters of every kind were excluded.

In this way the proletariat at once, at a single blow, immediately after it seizes the state power, can succeed in wresting from the bourgeoisie the vast mass of the latter's followers among the petty-bourgeois and the "Socialist" parties. For this mass consists of toilers and exploited, whom the bourgeoisie (including its toadies, the Chernovs, Kautskys, Martovs, and Co.) have deceived and who, with the establishment of the Soviet power, for the first time in their history secure a weapon in the mass struggle for the protection of their interests against the bourgeoisie.

In the second place, the proletariat can and must immediately, or at any rate very quickly, deprive the bourgeoisie and the petty-bourgeois democrats of "their" masses, i.e., of the masses who follow them, by satisfying their most urgent economic needs in a revolutionary way, i.e., by expropriating the landlords and the bourgeoisie.

This the bourgeoisie cannot do, no matter how "mighty" is the state power it possesses.

But this the proletariat can do immediately it seizes the power of the state, for it possesses both the machinery (the Soviets) and the economic means (expropriation of the landlords and the bourgeoisie) necessary for the purpose.

That is exactly how the Russian proletariat won the peasantry away from the Socialist-Revolutionaries, doing so literally within a few hours after it had seized the state power. For within a few hours after it had gained the victory over the bourgeoisie in Petrograd, the triumphant proletariat promulgated the Decree on the Land, by which it immediately, with revolutionary dispatch, energy and thoroughness, satisfied all the most urgent economic needs of the majority of the peasants and completely expropriated the landlords without compensation.

In order to prove to the peasants that it was the desire of the proletarians not to sergeant-major them, to order them about, but to assist them and be their friends, the victorious Bolsheviks introduced not one word of their own into the Decree on the Land, but copied it word for word from the peasant Instructions (of course the most revolutionary) that had been published by the Socialist-Revolutionaries in the Socialist-Revolutionary paper.

The Socialist-Revolutionaries were enraged, indignant, disgusted, and cried out that "the Bolsheviks had stolen their programme." But they were only laughed at for their pains. A fine party, indeed, that had to be defeated and driven out of power, in order that all that was revolutionary and advantageous to the toilers in its programme might be carried out!

The traitors, blockheads, and pedants of the Second International could never understand this dialectics—that the proletariat cannot triumph unless it wins a majority of the population over to its side, but that to confine the winning of a majority to, or make it conditional upon, obtaining a majority of votes at the polls under the rule of the bourgeoisie is either the densest stupidity, or a sheer attempt to fool the workers. In order to win the majority of the population, the proletariat must, in the first place, overthrow the bourgeoisie and seize the power of the state; secondly, it must set up a Soviet government and smash the old machinery of state to atoms, whereby it immediately undermines the rule, authority and influence of the bourgeoisie and the petty-bourgeois compromisers over the non-proletarian toiling masses; and, thirdly, it must entirely destroy the influence of the bourgeoisie and the petty-bourgeois compromisers over the majority of the non-proletarian toiling masses by satisfying their economic needs in a revolutionary way at the expense of the exploiters.

All this is possible, of course, only when a certain level of capitalist development has been reached. For without that fundamental condition the proletariat does not become formed into a separate class, nor does it successfully undergo prolonged preparation, education, training and testing in the struggle in the course of many years of strikes, demonstrations and pillorying and expulsion of opportunists. Without that fundamental condition, the centres cannot assume that economic and political importance which permits the proletariat, by seizing the centres, to seize the entire power of the state, or, more truly, its vital nerve, its core, its nodal point. Without that fundamental condition, there cannot be that kinship, that closeness and connection between the position of the proletariat and the position of the non-proletarian toiling masses which is essential if the proletariat is successfully to exert its influence over those masses.

V

Let us proceed further.

The proletariat can win the power of the state, establish a Soviet system and satisfy the economic needs of the majority of the toilers at the expense of the exploiters.

Is that all that is required for a final and complete victory?

No.

It is an illusion of the petty-bourgeois democrats and of their chief representatives at the present day, the "Socialists" and the "Social-Democrats," to imagine that the toiling masses under capitalism can attain to such a degree of class consciousness, such strength of character, such penetration and breadth of political outlook, as to enable them to decide by merely voting, or generally to decide in advance, without long experience and struggle, which class or which party they shall follow.

That is an illusion. It is a sweet fable of the pedants and sugary Socialists of the type of Kautsky, Longuet and MacDonald.

Capitalism would not be capitalism if it did not on the one hand condemn the masses to a crushed, downtrodden, terrorised, disunited (the countryside!) and ignorant existence, and if on the other it (capitalism) did not place at the disposal of the bourgeoisie a gigantic apparatus for lying and deceit, for the wholesale fooling and stupefying of the workers and the peasants.

Only the proletariat, therefore, can lead the toilers from capitalism to communism. There is absolutely no possibility of the petty-bourgeois or semi-petty-bourgeois masses of the toilers deciding in advance the complex political question of whether they should side with the working class or with the bourgeoisie. Vacillation on the part of the non-proletarian toiling strata is inevitable. It inevitably requires their own practical experience to enable them to compare the leadership of the bourgeoisie with the leadership of the proletariat.

This circumstance the devotees of "consistent democracy" constantly lose sight of. They imagine that serious political questions can be decided by voting. As a matter of fact, such questions, when they have been rendered crucial by the struggle, are decided by civil war; and in civil war the experience of the non-proletarian toiling masses (particularly the peasants) in comparing and contrasting proletarian government with bourgeois government is of tremendous importance.

In this respect the elections to the Constituent Assembly in Russia in November 1917, contrasted with the two years of civil war (1917-19), are extremely instructive.

Let us see what regions proved to be least Bolshevik. First, the Eastern Urals and Siberia, which gave the Bolsheviks 12 per cent and 10 per cent of the votes respectively, and, secondly, the Ukraine, which gave the Bolsheviks 10 per cent of the votes. Of the remaining regions, the lowest percentage of votes was given the Bolsheviks by the peasant region of Great Russia, the Volga and Black-Earth Region, but even here the Bolsheviks secured 16 per cent of the votes.

And it is in the regions where in November 1917 the lowest percentage of votes was cast for the Bolsheviks that the counter-revolutionary movement, the uprisings and organisation of forces of counter-revolution, were most successful. It was in these regions that Kolchak and Denikin maintained their power for many long months.

The vacillations of the petty-bourgeois population were very strikingly revealed in the regions where the influence of the proletariat was least felt.

At first they were for the Bolsheviks, when the latter gave them land and when the demobilised soldiers brought the news of peace. Then they went against the Bolsheviks, when the latter, in the interests of the international development of the revolution, and in order to preserve the hearth of revolution in Russia, accepted the Brest-Litovsk Peace, thereby "offending" one of the most profound of petty-bourgeois sentiments, patriotism. The dictatorship of the proletariat was not to the liking of the peasants in regions with large surpluses of grain, when the Bolsheviks showed that they would be stern and unbending in demanding that these surpluses be surrendered to the state at fixed prices. The peasants of the Urals, Siberia and the Ukraine thereupon turned towards Kolchak and Denikin.

Next, the experience of the "democracy" of Kolchak and Denikin, so trumpeted by every journalist in every White Guard paper in Kolchakia and Denikinland, proved to the peasants that the talk about democracy and the Constituent Assembly was only a screen for the dictatorship of the landlords and capitalists.

A new swing-over to the Bolsheviks began: the peasant uprisings in the rear of Kolchak and Denikin multiplied. The Red troops were greeted by the peasants as liberators.

In the long run it was these vacillations of the peasants, who constitute the greater part of the petty-bourgeois toiling masses, that decided the fate of the Soviet power and of the power of Kolchak and Denikin. But the "long run" was preceded by a fairly long period of bitter struggle and painful experience, which even now, after the lapse of two years, has not ended in Russia, has not ended, that is, in Siberia and the Ukraine. And one cannot vouch that it will finally end within, say, another year or so.

The adherents of "consistent" democracy have never reflected on the significance of this historical fact. They believed, and still believe, in the fairy-tale that the proletariat under capitalism can "convince" the majority of the toilers and definitely win them over to its side by mere voting. But the facts show that only in the course of a long and bitter struggle, and only after comparing the dictatorship of the proletariat with the dictatorship of the capitalists, is the vacillating petty bourgeoisie led by its own painful experience to the conclusion that the former is preferable to the latter.

All Socialists who have studied Marxism and are desirous of profiting by the experience of the political history of the advanced countries during the nineteenth century theoretically admit the inevitability of the vacillations of the petty bourgeoisie between the proletariat and the capitalist class. The economic roots of these vacillations are clearly revealed by economic science, the truths of which have been repeated a million times in the newspapers, leaflets and pamphlets of the Socialists of the Second International.

But people seem incapable of applying these truths to the specific epoch of the dictatorship of the proletariat. They replace the class struggle by petty-bourgeois democratic prejudices and illusions ("equality" of classes, "consistent" or "pure" democracy, the decision of great historical questions by means of the ballot, etc.). They refuse to understand that by seizing the power of the state the proletariat does not thereby put an end to its class struggle, but continues it in a different form and by different methods. The dictatorship of the proletariat is the class war of the proletariat fought with the weapon of the power of the state; it is a class war one of the aims of which is to demonstrate to the non-proletarian toiling strata by protracted experience and by a long series of practical examples that it is better for them to side with the dictatorship of the proletariat than to side with the dictatorship of the bourgeoisie, and that no third course exists.

The figures for the elections to the Constituent Assembly in November 1917 provide a background for the picture presented by the development of the civil war in the course of the subsequent two years. The basic forces in this war are already clearly discernible in the elections to the Constituent Assembly: we see the part played by the "striking force" of the proletarian army, the part played by the vacillating peasants, and the part played by the bourgeoisie.

In his article N. V. Svyatitsky writes:

"The Cadets achieved their greatest successes in the same regions as the Bolsheviks: the Northern and the Central Industrial Regions" (p. 116).

It is natural that the elements intermediary between the proletariat and the bourgeoisie were weakest in the most highly developed capitalist centres. It is natural that the class struggle was most acute in these centres. It was at these points that the main forces of the bourgeoisie were concentrated, and only at these points was the proletariat in a position to defeat the bourgeoisie. Only the proletariat could inflict a crushing defeat upon it. And only after having crushed it was the proletariat able, using so effective an instrument as the state, to win the sympathy and support of the petty-bourgeois sections of the population.

If we know how to read and use them, the figures of the elections to the Constituent Assembly once more prove the fundamental truths of the Marxian doctrine of the class struggle.

Incidentally, these figures also demonstrate the role and significance of the national question. Take the Ukraine. At the recent conferences on the Ukrainian question certain comrades accused the writer of "attaching undue importance" to the national question in the Ukraine.* The figures for the elections to the Constituent Assembly show that in the Ukraine in November 1917 the Ukrainian Socialist-Revolutionaries and Socialists received the majority (3,400,000 votes plus 500,000, or 3,900,000 votes, as against 1,900,000 votes cast for the Russian Socialist-Revolutionaries, out of a total of 7,600,000 votes cast in the Ukraine). In the armies on the South-Western and Rumanian fronts the Ukrainian Socialists received 30 per cent and 34 per cent of the total vote respectively, as against 40 per cent and 59 per cent received by the Russian Socialist-Revolutionaries.

Under such circumstances, to ignore the importance of the national question in the Ukraine—of which Great-Russians are frequently guilty (and perhaps Jews not much less frequently than Great-Russians)—is a profound and dangerous error. The separation of the Russian and the Ukrainian Socialist-Revolutionaries in the Ukraine in 1917 cannot have been a mere accident. It is our duty as internationalists, first, to conduct a particularly energetic campaign against the survivals (at times unconscious) of Great-Russian imperialism and chauvinism among the "Russian" Communists, and, secondly, to make concessions on this national question, since comparatively it is unimportant (for an internationalist the question of state boundaries is of second-rate, if not of tenth-rate, importance). Other questions are important, such as the fundamental interests of the dictatorship of the proletariat, the unity and discipline of the Red Army fighting against Denikin, the leadership of the proletariat in relation to the peasantry. Whether the Ukraine shall be a separate state or not is a question of far inferior importance. We should not be surprised—or frightened—by the prospect of the workers and peasants of the Ukraine trying various systems, and in the course of several years, say, testing by practical experiment fusion with the R.S.F.S.R., secession from the R.S.F.S.R. and the formation of an independent Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, various forms of close alliance with the R.S.F.S.R., and so on, and so forth.

To attempt to settle this problem in advance, once and for all, “firmly” and “irrevocably,” would be narrow-mindedness, or sheer folly, for the vacillations of the non-proletarian toiling masses on such a question are entirely natural and even inevitable, and in no way alarming for the proletariat. A representative of the proletariat who is really an internationalist should exercise the greatest caution and tolerance towards such vacillations; he must leave it to the non-proletarian toiling elements themselves to overcome these vacillations by their own experience. But we must be stern and uncompromising, intolerant and merciless, in regard to other, more fundamental, questions, some of which I have already indicated above.

VI

A comparison of the elections to the Constituent Assembly in November 1917 with the development of the proletarian revolution in Russia from October 1917 to December 1919 enables us to draw conclusions that are applicable to bourgeois parliamentarism and the proletarian revolution in every capitalist country. Let us attempt to enumerate, or at least indicate, the most important of these conclusions.

1) Universal suffrage provides an index of the state of maturity of the various classes in the understanding of their class problems. It shows how the various classes are inclined to solve their problems. But the solution of the problems is effected not by means of the ballot, but by the class struggle in all its forms, including civil war.

2) The Socialists and Social-Democrats of the Second International profess the point of view of vulgar petty-bourgeois demo-crazy, and share the prejudice that the ballot can solve the fundamental problems of the class struggle.

3) It is essential that the party of the revolutionary proletariat should participate in bourgeois parliamentarism for the purpose of educating the masses by means of elections and the struggle of parties within parliament. But to confine the class struggle to the parliamentary struggle, or to regard the latter as the supreme and decisive form of struggle, to which all other forms of struggle are subordinate, is in practice to desert the proletariat for the bourgeoisie.

4) In fact, all the representatives and supporters of the Second International, and all the leaders of the so-called German "Independent" Social-Democrats, are thus deserting to the side of the bourgeoisie, inasmuch as, while giving verbal recognition to the dictatorship of the proletariat, they in practice, in their propaganda, inculcate the idea into the proletariat that it must obtain a formal expression of the will of the majority of the population under capitalism (i.e., a majority of votes in the bourgeois parliament) before political power can pass into the hands of the proletariat.

The German "Independent" Social-Democrats and similar leaders of rotten Socialism, who, starting from this premise, howl against the "dictatorship of a minority," and so forth, simply reveal their lack of understanding of the fact that a dictatorship of the bourgeoisie dominates even the most democratic republics, and their lack of understanding of the conditions under which this dictatorship can be destroyed by the class struggle of the proletariat.

5) This lack of understanding, in particular, consists in the following: they forget that the bourgeois parties maintain their rule chiefly by deceiving the masses of the population and by the oppression exercised by capital, to which is added self-deception as to the nature of capitalism, a self-deception that is characteristic particularly of the petty-bourgeois parties, which as a rule are anxious to replace the class struggle by more or less concealed forms of class conciliation.

Let the majority of the population, while private property still exists, i.e., under the rule and yoke of capital, first express themselves in favour of the party of the proletariat, and only then the latter can and should take power—so say the petty-bourgeois democrats, who call themselves “Socialists” but are in reality the servitors of the bourgeoisie.

We say: Let the revolutionary proletariat first overthrow the bourgeoisie, break the yoke of capital and smash the bourgeois state machine; then the victorious proletariat will rapidly be able to gain the sympathy and support of the majority of the toiling non-proletarian masses by satisfying their needs at the expense of the exploiters. The contrary would be a rare exception in history (ay, and in such an exception the bourgeoisie may resort to civil war, as was shown in the case of Finland*).

6) Or, in other words:

We must first give an undertaking to observe the principles of equality, or of consistent democracy, leaving private property and the yoke of capital intact (i.e., formal equality, but actual inequality), and must endeavour to secure a majority on that basis—so say the bourgeoisie and their chorus, the petty-bourgeois democrats, who call themselves Socialists and Social-Democrats.

We say: First the class war of the proletariat, by seizing the power of the state, must destroy the props and foundations of actual inequality, and then the proletariat, having defeated the exploiters, can lead the toiling masses to the abolition of classes, i.e., to socialist equality, the only equality that is not a deception.

7) In every capitalist country, apart from the proletariat, or that section of the proletariat which realises its revolutionary aims and is capable of fighting for their realisation, there are numerically large proletarian strata of the toiling masses who do not realise that they are proletarians, who are half proletarian and half petty-bourgeois, who support the bourgeoisie and the bourgeois democrats (including the “Socialists” of the Second International) and are deceived by them; for they have no faith in their own strength or the strength of the proletariat, and do not realise that it is possible to secure the satisfaction of their essential needs by expropriating the exploiters.

These sections of toilers and exploited provide allies for the vanguard of the proletariat, and with them the proletariat forms a solid majority of the population. But the proletariat can win over these allies only with the aid of such an instrument as the power of the state, i.e., only after the bourgeoisie has been overthrown and its state machinery smashed.

8) In all capitalist countries the strength of the proletariat is incomparably greater than its numerical strength in proportion to the total population. This is due to the fact that the proletariat economically dominates the centre and nerve of the whole economic system of capitalism, and also because under capitalism the proletariat economically and politically expresses the true interests of the vast majority of the toilers.

For this reason the proletariat, even when it forms a minority of the population (or when the class conscious and truly revolutionary vanguard of the proletariat forms a minority of the population), is capable of overthrowing the bourgeoisie and of then gaining numerous allies from among the mass of semi-proletarians and petty bourgeois, who otherwise would never have expressed themselves in favour of the rule of the proletariat, and would never have understood the conditions and aims of the rule of the proletariat, and who only by their subsequent experience become convinced that the dictatorship of the proletariat is inevitable, proper and legitimate.

9) And, finally, in every capitalist country there are always vast numbers of the petty bourgeoisie, who inevitably vacillate between capital and labour. In order to achieve victory, the proletariat must first select the right moment for a decisive attack upon the bourgeoisie, taking into account, among other things, the divergence between the bourgeoisie and its petty-bourgeois allies, or the instability of their alliance, and so forth. Secondly, the proletariat, after its victory, must so take advantage of the vacillations of the petty bourgeoisie as to neutralise it and prevent it from going over to the side of the exploiters, and must be able to maintain itself for a definite period in spite of those vacillations, and so on, and so forth.

10) One of the essential conditions for preparing the proletariat for victory is a prolonged, persistent and ruthless struggle against opportunism, reformism, social-chauvinism, and similar bourgeois influences and tendencies, which are inevitable as long as the proletariat acts under capitalist conditions. Unless such a struggle is fought, and unless a complete victory over opportunism within the working class movement is preliminarily gained, there can be no hope for the dictatorship of the proletariat. Bolshevism would never have triumphed over the bourgeoisie in 1917-19 had it not previously learned, during the years 1903-17, to defeat and ruthlessly expel the Mensheviks, i.e., the opportunists, reformists and social-chauvinists, from the party of the proletarian vanguard.

The recognition of the dictatorship of the proletariat by the leaders of the German "Independents," the French Longuetists,* etc., in word, while in deed they continue their old habitual policy of making concessions and indulgences to opportunism, of compromising with opportunism, of slavishly worshipping the prejudices of bourgeois democracy ("consistent democracy" or "pure democracy," as they call it), of bourgeois parliamentarism, etc., is a dangerous form of self-deception—ay, and at times a deliberate fraud upon the workers.

December 29 (16), 1919

THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE REVOLUTION

*Speech Delivered at the Sixth Extraordinary Congress of Soviets, November 6, 1918

COMRADES, we are celebrating the anniversary of our revolution at a moment when events of the utmost importance are taking place in the international working class movement, and when it has become obvious to even the most sceptical and doubting elements of the working class and the toilers that the World War will end neither by agreements nor by violence on the part of the old government and the old ruling bourgeois class; that it is leading not only Russia but the whole world to a world proletarian revolution and to the triumph of the workers over capital, which has drenched the earth in blood; and that after the violence and outrages of German imperialism the same policy is being pursued by Anglo-French imperialism, supported by Austria and Germany.

Today, when celebrating the anniversary of the revolution, it is fitting that we cast a glance back along the path traversed by the revolution. We were obliged to begin our revolution under unusually difficult conditions, such as no other working class revolution in the world will ever have to face. It is therefore particularly important that we should endeavour to review the whole path we have traversed, to ascertain what we have achieved during this period, and to what extent we have prepared ourselves during the past year for the fulfilment of our chief, our true, our decisive and fundamental task. We must be one of the divisions, one of the units of the world proletarian and socialist army. We have always realised that if we were called upon to begin the revolution, which grew out of the world struggle, it was not on account of any merit of the Russian proletariat, or because it was in advance of the others. On the contrary, it was only because of the particular weakness and backwardness of capitalism, and the particular pressure of military strategic circumstances, that we were obliged by the course of events to occupy a position in advance of the other divisions, and to wait until they also began to move and rose in revolt. We now undertake this review in order to ascertain to what extent we are prepared for the battles that will face us in our coming revolution.

And so, comrades, when we ask ourselves what we have done on a large scale during the past year, we must reply that the following has been done: from workers' control,¹ the first measure taken by the working class, and from husbanding the resources of the country, we are directly confronted with the task of creating a workers' administration of industry; in place of the general struggle of the peasants for land, the struggle of the peasants against the landlords, a struggle that bore a national, bourgeois and democratic character, we have reached a stage when the proletarian and semi-proletarian elements in the countryside have become differentiated: those who toil and are exploited have become differentiated and have arisen to build a new life; the most oppressed section of the rural population has entered upon a life-and-death struggle against the bourgeoisie, including their own rural kulak bourgeoisie.

Furthermore, from the first steps of Soviet organisation we have now reached a stage where, as Comrade Sverdlov in opening this Congress justly remarked, there is not a corner in Russia, however remote, where Soviet organisation has not firmly established itself and become an integral part of the Soviet constitution, which was based on the long experience gained in the struggle of the toilers and the oppressed.

In place of our utter defencelessness, after the last four years' war, which has left in the masses not only the hatred natural to oppressed people, but also revulsion, terrible fatigue and exhaustion, and which condemned the revolution to a most difficult period, during which we were defenceless against the blows of German and Austrian imperialism—in place of this defenceless-

¹ See note to p. 410.*—Ed.

ness we have now a powerful Red Army. Finally, and most important of all, in place of our international isolation, from which we suffered both at the time of the October Revolution and at the beginning of the present year, we have now reached a position when our only true allies, the toilers and the oppressed of all countries, have at last arisen; when the leaders of the West European proletariat, such as Liebknecht and Adler, who paid with long months of imprisonment for their bold and heroic endeavours to raise their voices against the imperialist war, have been liberated because the workers' revolutions in Vienna and Berlin, which are developing daily and hourly, compelled their liberation.¹ In place of our isolation, we have now reached a position in which we are marching shoulder to shoulder with our international allies. Such are the fundamental achievements of the past year. Permit me briefly to dwell on this path, on this transitional stage.

Comrades, our slogan at first was workers' control. We declared that in spite of the promises of the Kerensky government capital was continuing to sabotage production in the country and was reducing it to a state of ruin. We now realise that disruption was close at hand; and workers' control was therefore the first and essential measure that had to be taken by every not only socialist, but even labour government. We did not decree socialism immediately in all our industries, since socialism can take shape and consolidate itself only when the working class has learnt how to rule, and when the authority of the working class masses has been definitely established. Without that, socialism is but a pious wish. We therefore introduced workers' control, knowing that it was an inconsistent and incomplete measure, that it was necessary for the workers themselves to assume the great task of building up the industry of this vast country without exploiters, and in spite of the exploiters. And, comrades, those who took a direct, or even an indirect, part in this work, those who had suffered the oppression and brutality of the old capitalist regime, learned a great deal. We know that very little has yet been achieved; we know that in this extremely backward and impoverished country, where every hindrance and obstacle was put in the way of the working class, a long time is necessary before that class can learn to manage industry. But what in our opinion is most important and most valuable is that the workers have themselves undertaken to manage, and that workers' control, which in all the main branches of industry was bound to be chaotic, disorganised, primitive and incomplete, is now giving place to workers' management of industry on a national scale.

¹ Lenin is referring to the Austrian and German revolutions of November 1918, which resulted in the overthrow of the monarchies of those countries and the setting up of republics, in Germany on November 9, and in Austria on November 12, 1918.—Ed.

The position of the workers and the trade unions has changed. Their main duty now is to appoint their representatives to all management boards and central bodies and to all the new organisations which have taken over from capitalism a disrupted and deliberately sabotaged industry. They undertook this task without the assistance of those intellectuals who from the very outset deliberately used their knowledge and superior education—the result of the store of science accumulated by mankind—to frustrate the cause of socialism, who used science not to assist the masses in organising a social economic system of the people without exploiters, but to put a spoke in the wheel, in order to hinder the workers, who had taken upon themselves the task of administration although they were least trained for it. We can now say that the main hindrance has been smashed. It was extremely difficult, but the sabotage of all elements who gravitate towards the bourgeoisie has been broken. In spite of tremendous handicaps, the workers have succeeded in effecting this basic step, which has laid the foundation of socialism. We do not exaggerate, nor do we fear to tell the truth. Yes, it is true that from the point of view of the final aim very little has been achieved. But a great deal, a very great deal, has been done to strengthen the foundation. When we speak of socialism we cannot say that the foundation which has been laid in the working class masses is a conscious one, in the sense that they have procured and read books or pamphlets; it is conscious in the sense that they have undertaken the performance of an extremely difficult task by their own energies and with their own hands. They committed thousands of blunders, and themselves suffered from these blunders. But every blunder tempered and steeled them in the work of organising the administration of industry, which has now been established and placed upon a firm foundation. This task they have accomplished. This work will no longer be conducted as it was heretofore. Now, not merely the leaders and not merely the advanced workers, but the widest strata, the entire mass of workers know that they are building socialism with their own hands, that the foundation has been laid and that there is no force within the country that can prevent them from carrying the work to a successful conclusion.

While great difficulties were encountered in industry, where we had to traverse a path which to many seemed long, but which was actually brief, a path which led from workers' control to workers' management, in the more backward countryside far greater preparatory work had to be performed. Those who have studied rural life and have associated with the peasant masses in the countryside say that the October Revolution of the towns became a real October Revolution in the countryside only in the summer and autumn of 1918. And here, comrades, when the Petrograd proletariat and the soldiers of the Petrograd garrison took over power, they fully realised that constructive work would encounter far greater difficulties in the countryside; that here one must proceed more gradually; that to attempt to establish social cultivation of the land by means of decrees and legislation would be the height of folly; that an insignificant number of enlightened peasants might agree to this, but that the vast majority of the peasants had no such object in view. We therefore confined ourselves to that which was absolutely essential in the interests of the development of the revolution, namely, in no case to endeavour to outrun the development of the masses, but to wait until, as a result of their own experience and their own struggles, a progressive movement grew up. In October we confined ourselves to sweeping away forthwith the ancient enemy of the peasants, the feudal landlord, the latifundist. That was the struggle of the peasantry as a whole. Here the peasantry was not yet divided into proletariat, semi-proletariat, poor peasantry and bourgeoisie. We

Socialists knew that socialism was impossible without that struggle. But we also knew that our knowledge in itself was not enough; that it was essential that that knowledge should reach the millions, and not by means of propaganda, but as a result of the experience gained by the millions themselves. And therefore, since the peasants as a whole could not conceive the revolution on any other basis than that of equal land tenure, we openly declared in our decree of November 8 (October 26), 1917, that we would adopt the peasants' Instructions on the land question as a basis.¹

We frankly declared that these Instructions did not correspond with our views, that this was not communism; but that we did not intend to impose what answered to our programme but did not answer to their views. We declared that we would march with them as with comrades in toil, confident that the progress of the revolution would lead them to the position at which we had arrived ourselves. As a result, we have the peasant movement. The agrarian reform began with the socialisation of the land, which we ourselves helped to carry by our votes while openly declaring that it did not correspond to our views; for, knowing that the vast majority shared the view of equal land tenure, we had no desire to force anything upon them, and preferred to wait until the peasants themselves outlived this view and were ready to advance farther. We waited and were able to mobilise our forces.

The law we then adopted was based on general democratic principles and on that which united the rich kulak muzhik with the poor muzhik, namely, hatred of the landlord. It was based on the general idea of equality, which was undoubtedly a revolutionary idea directed against the old monarchical order. From that law we had to proceed to differentiate the peasants. The law on the socialisation of the land met with general approval. It was adopted unanimously both by us and by those who did not share the views of the Bolsheviks. We left it primarily to the agricultural communes to decide who should possess the land. We left the path open for the development of agriculture along socialist lines, fully realising that agriculture then, in October 1917, was unable to adopt that path. As a result of our preparatory work, a step of vast, world-historic significance was achieved, without parallel in the most democratic republican states. That step was taken by the masses this summer even in the most remote Russian villages. When matters reached the pass of food difficulties and famine, when, as a result of the old heritage and of the four accursed years of war, owing to counter-revolution and civil war, we were deprived of the richest of our grain regions, when matters reached a state of extremity and the cities were menaced with famine, then the sole faithful and reliable support of our government, the advanced workers of the cities and the industrial regions, began a united movement into the villages. It is a sheer slander to say that the workers set out to provoke armed conflict between the workers and the peasants. Events have refuted that slander. They set out to repulse the exploiting elements of the countryside, the kulaks, who were amassing untold wealth by speculation in grain while the people were dying of hunger. They set out to aid the poor labouring peasants, who constitute the majority of the rural population. That they did not go in vain, that they extended the hand of alliance, that their preparatory work was taken up by the masses—that was fully proved in July, by the July crisis,¹ when kulak revolts flared up throughout Russia. The July crisis ended with the toiling and exploited elements in the countryside rising up everywhere, rising in alliance with the proletariat of the towns. Today Comrade Zinoviev informed me over the telephone that 18,000 people were present at the Petrograd Regional Congress of the Committees of Poor Peasants, and that a most unusual spirit of enthusiasm and animation prevailed. That which is taking place all over Russia is adopting more definite form, so that when the poor peasants rose, they saw from their own experience what the struggle against the kulaks meant. They realised that in order to keep the cities supplied with food, and in order to re-establish the exchange of goods, without which the village cannot exist, they must not follow the rural bourgeoisie and the kulaks. They saw that they must organise themselves separately.

¹ Pp. 405-09 in the present volume.—Ed.

¹ See note to p. 425.*—Ed.

And we have now taken the first big step towards the socialist revolution in the countryside. In October that was impossible. We grasped the moment when the masses could be approached, and we have now reached a point where the socialist revolution in the countryside has begun, where there is not a village, however remote, where it is not realised that neighbour rich peasant and neighbour kulak, in speculating in grain, are regarding events from the old backwater village point of view.

And only now will the peasant households, the peasant poor, rallying around their leaders, the workers of the cities, provide a stable foundation for real socialist construction. Only now will socialist construction begin in the countryside. Only now are Soviets and farms being formed that are systematically striving for the collective cultivation of the soil on a large scale, for the application of knowledge, science and machinery, which in the old ignorant and reactionary times were unable to create even the most simple and elementary human culture. The work to be performed here is even more difficult than in the case of industry. Even greater mistakes are being here committed by our local committees and Soviets. But they are learning from their mistakes. We are not afraid of mistakes when they are committed by the masses, who regard constructive effort in an enlightened manner, for we rely only on our own experience and on the work of our own hands.

And now the tremendous upheaval that in so short a time has led us to socialism in the countryside is showing that our fight has been crowned with success. The Red Army is the most striking proof of that. You know what situation we were in at the time of the world imperialist war, when the condition of Russia rendered the lot of the masses intolerable. You know that at that time we were in a state of utter helplessness. We frankly told the working class masses the whole truth. We exposed the secret imperialist treaties, the fruits of a policy which serves as a vast instrument of deception, and which now in America, the most advanced of the bourgeois imperialist democratic republics, is deceiving and fooling the masses as never before. When the imperialist character of the war became patent to all, the Russian Soviet republic was the only country that completely destroyed the secret foreign policy of the bourgeoisie. It exposed the secret treaties and declared, through Comrade Trotsky, to all the countries of the world: We appeal to you to put an end to this war in a democratic way, without annexations and without indemnities, and frankly and proudly declare the truth, a bitter truth, but nevertheless the truth, that in order to end the war a revolution against the bourgeois government is required. But our cry met with no response. And so we had to pay the heavy price of the onerous peace that was forced upon us by the Brest-Litovsk Treaty, a treaty that filled many of our sympathisers with gloom and despair. That was because we were alone. But we were doing our duty: we told you that these were the purposes of the war! The torrent of German imperialism was able to overwhelm us because it required a considerable period of time before our workers and peasants could achieve solid organisation. At that time we had no army; all we had was the old disorganised army of the imperialists, driven to participate in a war for aims which the soldiers did not desire and with which they did not sympathise. It turned out that we had to undergo an extremely painful upheaval. It was a period in which the masses needed to recover from the sufferings of the imperialist war and to realise that a new war was beginning. We shall be entitled to regard as our war a war which will be waged in defence of our socialist revolution. That is what millions and tens of millions of people had to learn from their own experience. It required months. The learning of this lesson was slow and painful. But by the summer of this year it became obvious to all that the lesson had at last been learnt; that a transformation had taken place; that in order that the army, which is the product of the masses of the people, because it is an expression of their weariness and despair, which is sacrificing itself, and which after four years of most sanguinary warfare is again prepared to go to war—that in order that such an army should support the Soviet republic of our country it was necessary that the weariness and despair of the masses preparing to enter the shambles should give place to a clear realisation of the fact that it is indeed their own cause for which they are going to die, the cause of the workers' and peasants' Soviets, the cause of the socialist republic. That has been achieved.

The victories we gained over the Czecho-Slovakians in the summer, and the news now being received of victories, quite considerable victories, prove that a transformation has taken place, and that the most difficult of tasks—the creation, after four years of painful war, of a consciously socialist organisation of the masses—has been achieved. That consciousness has struck deep roots among the masses. Tens of millions of people have realised that they are engaged in a difficult cause. And that is a pledge that we shall not succumb to despair, in spite of the fact that the forces of world imperialism, which at present are stronger than we are, are being mustered against us, in spite of the fact that we are surrounded by the soldiers of the imperialists, who have come to realise the danger of a Soviet power and are burning with a desire to strangle it, and in spite of the fact that we tell the truth and do not conceal that they are stronger than we are.

We declare that we are growing, that the Soviet republic is growing. The cause of the proletarian revolution is growing faster than the imperialist forces are drawing in upon us. We are full of hope and of the certainty that we are waging war in the interests not only of the Russian socialist revolution, but of the world socialist revolution. Our hopes of victory are growing rapidly, because the class consciousness of our workers is growing. What was the state of Soviet organisation in October of last year? Only the first steps were being taken. We were still unable to put it on a proper basis. But now we have a Soviet constitution. The Soviet constitution, ratified in July, is, as we know, not the invention of a commission, it is not the creation of jurists, nor is it copied from other constitutions. The world has never known such a constitution as ours. It embodies the experience of the struggle and organisation of the proletarian masses against the exploiters both of our country and of the whole world. We possess a fund of fighting experience. That fund of experience provided a striking corroboration of the fact that the organised workers created a Soviet government without bureaucrats, without a standing army, and without privileges (privileges in practice designed for the bourgeoisie), that they waged the struggle on the whole no worse than these, and created the foundations of a new order in the mills and factories. We are entering on this work and are drawing into it new collaborators, who are essential in order to carry the Soviet constitution into effect. We have ready cadres of new recruits, young peasants, who must be drawn into the work, become part of the new cadres and help to carry our cause to completion.

The last question on which I desire to dwell is the international situation. We are standing shoulder to shoulder with our international comrades, and we can now see for ourselves with what decision and energy they are expressing their conviction that the Russian proletarian revolution will march hand in hand with them, the international revolution.

As the international significance of the revolution grew, the imperialists of the whole world concentrated their forces more furiously against us. In October 1917 they regarded our republic as a curiosity not worthy of serious attention. In February they looked upon it as an experiment in socialism not to be taken seriously. But the army of the republic grew and gained in strength. The most difficult task was accomplished—the creation of a socialist Red Army. As our cause gained in strength, and as its successes multiplied, the opposition and the hatred of the imperialists of all countries grew more rabid and have now reached such a pitch that the British and French capitalists, who proclaimed that they were the enemies of Wilhelm, are on the verge of uniting with this same Wilhelm for the purpose of strangling the socialist Soviet republic. For they have come to realise that it is no longer a curiosity, or an experiment in socialism, but the genuine home of the world socialist revolution. Hence, with the growing success of our revolution the number of our enemies also increased. We must realise what is facing us, without in any way concealing the seriousness of our situation. And we are prepared to meet it. We are no longer alone: with us are the workers of Vienna and Berlin, who are rising to fight the same fight, and who perhaps will bring to our common cause a higher degree of discipline and class consciousness.

Comrades, in order that you may realise how the clouds are gathering around our Soviet republic and what dangers are threatening us, permit me to read you the text of a note addressed to us by the German government through its consulate.¹

Comrades, we know perfectly well that the German government was fully aware of the fact that from the very beginning of the war the Russian embassy had enjoyed the hospitality of the German Socialists, and that no supporters of German imperialism ever crossed the threshold of the Russian embassy. The friends of the Russian embassy were those Socialists who were opposed to the war and who sympathised with Karl Liebknecht. They were its guests from the very inception of the embassy; with them alone did we have any intercourse. The German government was perfectly aware of that. It followed the movements of the representatives of our government as zealously as the government of Nicholas II used to follow the movements of our comrades. The German government is now making this gesture not because the situation has in any way changed, but because it formerly felt itself stronger, and was not afraid that one burning house on the streets of Berlin would start a conflagration throughout Germany. The German government has lost its head, and now that the whole of Germany is ablaze it thinks it can put out the fire by turning its police hose on one single house.

That is simply ridiculous. If the German government is going to break off diplomatic relations, we shall say that we knew that it would do it, that it was making every effort to achieve an alliance with the British and French imperialists. We know that Wilson's government sent telegram after telegram requesting that the

¹ Here Lenin read a note dated November 5, 1918, received from Wilhelm's government, which was then living its last days. The note declared that the German government was recalling its diplomatic representatives from the Soviet republic and demanded that the Soviet representatives should likewise be recalled from Germany. This severance of diplomatic relations was justified by the pretext that the Soviet government allegedly 1) was using its embassy for the purpose of spreading revolutionary appeals in Germany, and 2) was concealing and allowing to escape with impunity the murderers of Count Mirbach, the German Ambassador, who had been assassinated in Moscow in July 1918 by Left Socialist-Revolutionaries. The text of the note is omitted here. Those who are interested will find it quoted in the Collected Works of Lenin, Vol. XXIII.—Ed.

German armies should not be withdrawn from Poland, the Ukraine, Esthonia and Livonia; for, although it is an enemy of German imperialism, these armies are doing its work: they are crushing the Bolsheviks. Let them be withdrawn only when the pro-Entente armies of liberation appear on the scene to strangle the Bolsheviks.

We are perfectly aware of that; there is nothing unexpected for us from this quarter. All that we said was that now, when Germany is in flames, and when Austria is burning, when they have been obliged to liberate Liebknecht and allow him to visit the Russian embassy, as was decided by a general meeting of Socialists headed by Liebknecht—such a step on the part of the German government shows not so much that they want to fight as that they have completely lost their heads, that they are at a loss as to what decision they should take; for a terrible foe is advancing upon them—Anglo-American imperialism, which has crushed Austria with a peace that is a hundred times more coercive than the Peace of Brest-Litovsk. Germany sees that these liberators want to crush, torture and strangle her too. But at the same time working class Germany is rising. The German army proved to be useless, unfit to fight, not because discipline was weak, but because the soldiers who refused to fight were transferred from the Eastern front to the German Western front and carried with them what the bourgeoisie calls world Bolshevism.

That is why the German army proved unfit to fight; and this document is the best proof of their utter confusion. We say that it will lead to a diplomatic rupture, and that perhaps it might have led to war, were they strong enough to lead the White Guard armies. We have therefore sent a telegram to all the Soviets, which concludes by calling upon them to be on their guard, to hold themselves in readiness, to muster all their forces, for this is a manifestation of the fact that the chief aim of international imperialism is to overthrow Bolshevism. That would not only mean the defeat of Russia; it would mean the defeat of the workers in every country. But they will not succeed, no matter what brutalities and outrages may follow this decision. They, these wild beasts, are preparing to attack Russia from the South, through the Dardanelles, or by way of Bulgaria or Rumania. They are negotiating for the formation of a White Army in Germany to be thrown against Russia. We are fully aware of this danger, and publicly declare: Comrades, not in vain have we laboured a whole year; we have laid the foundation; we are approaching decisive battles, battles which will indeed be decisive. But we are not alone: the proletariat of Western Europe has risen; it has not left a stone standing in Austria-Hungary. The government of that country is as helpless, as utterly confused, has lost its head as completely as the government of Nicholas Romanov at the end of February 1917. Our cry must be: Again and again must every effort be bent, remembering that we are approaching the last decisive fight, not for the Russian revolution alone, but for the world socialist revolution!

We know that the wild beasts of imperialism are still stronger than we are. They can still inflict wholesale outrage, brutalities and atrocities upon our country. But they cannot defeat the world revolution. They are filled with savage hatred. And we therefore say: Come what may, every Russian worker and peasant will do his duty and will face death if the interests of the revolution demand it. We say: Come what may, no matter what miseries the imperialists may still inflict upon us, it will not save them. Imperialism will perish and the world socialist revolution will triumph in spite of all!

THE FOURTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE OCTOBER REVOLUTION ¹

THE fourth anniversary of November 7 (October 25) is approaching. The farther that great day recedes into the past, the clearer stands out the significance of the proletarian revolution in Russia, and the more deeply are we led to reflect upon the practical experience gained in our work as a whole.

In a very brief and, of course, far from complete and precise form this significance and experience may be outlined as follows.

The immediate and direct aim of the revolution in Russia was a bourgeois-democratic aim, namely, to destroy the relics of mediaevalism and abolish them completely; to purge Russia of that barbarity and shame, of that tremendous hindrance to all culture and progress in our country.

And we can pride ourselves on having effected that purge much more vigorously, much more rapidly, boldly and successfully, and, from the point of view of its effect on the broad masses of the population, much more extensively and profoundly, than was the case in the great French Revolution 125 years ago.

The anarchists and the petty-bourgeois democrats (i.e., the Mensheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionaries, who are the Russian representatives of that international social type) talked, and still talk, an incredible amount of nonsense regarding the relation between the bourgeois-democratic revolution and the socialist (i.e., proletarian) revolution. The last four years have completely confirmed the correctness of our understanding of Marxism on this point and of our estimate of the experience of former revolutions. We brought the bourgeois-democratic revolution to completion as nobody has done before. We are progressing towards the socialist revolution, consciously, deliberately and undeviatingly, knowing that no Chinese Wall separates it from the bourgeois-democratic revolution, and knowing too that struggle alone will determine (in the long run) how far we shall progress, what portion of this immeasurably great task we shall accomplish, and to what extent we shall succeed in consolidating our victories. Time will show. But we see even now that a tremendous amount (tremendous for this disorganised, exhausted and backward country) has already been done towards the socialist transformation of society.

¹ See note to p. 486.*—Ed.

Let us, however, finish what we have to say regarding the bourgeois-democratic content of our revolution. Marxists should understand what that means. In order to explain, let us take a few graphic examples.

The bourgeois-democratic content of the revolution means purging the social relations (systems and institutions) of the country of mediaevalism, serfdom, feudalism.

What were the chief manifestations, the chief survivals and remnants of feudalism in Russia in 1917? The monarchy, the social orders, landownership and land tenure, the position of women, religion, and the oppression of the nationalities. Take any one of these Augean stables, which, incidentally, were to a considerable extent left uncleansed by all the more advanced states when they accomplished their bourgeois-democratic revolutions 125, 250 and more years ago (1649 in England); take any of these Augean stables, and you will see that we have purged them thoroughly. In a matter of ten weeks, from November 7 (October 25), 1917, to the dispersal of the Constituent Assembly on January 18 (5), 1918, we did a thousand times more in this respect than was done by the bourgeois democrats and liberals (the Cadets) and by the petty-bourgeois democrats (the Mensheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionaries) during the eight months they were in power.

Those poltroons, chatterboxes, vainglorious Narcissuses and petty Hamlets flourished their pasteboard swords—but did not even destroy the monarchy. We cleaned out all that monarchist garbage as nobody had ever done before. We left not a stone standing of that ancient edifice, the social orders (even the most advanced countries, such as England, France and Germany, have not completely rid themselves of survivals of the social orders). The most profound roots of the system of social orders, namely, the remnants of feudalism and serfdom in landownership, we have completely eradicated. One may argue (there are enough quill-drivers, Cadets, Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries abroad to indulge in such arguments) as to what "in the long run" will be the outcome of the agrarian transformation effected by the October Revolution. We have no desire at present to waste time on such disputes, for we are deciding this dispute, as well as the whole mass of controversies connected with it, in a fighting fashion. But one cannot dispute the fact that the petty-bourgeois democrats attempted for eight months to "compromise" with the landlords, the guardians of the traditions of serfdom, while we in a few weeks completely wiped the landlords off the face of the Russian soil, together with all their traditions.

Take religion, or the denial of rights to women, or the oppression and inequality of the non-Russian nationalities. These are all problems of the bourgeois-democratic revolution. Those nincompoop petty-bourgeois democrats gabbled about them for eight months. There is not a single country in the world, even the most advanced, where these questions have been completely settled in a bourgeois-democratic way. In our country they have been settled completely by the legislation of the October Revolution. We fought, and are fighting, religion seriously. We have given all the non-Russian nationalities their own republics or autonomous regions. There is no longer in our country such baseness, meanness and infamy as the denial of rights to or the inequality of rights of women, that disgusting survival of feudalism and mediaevalism, which is being refurbished by the avaricious bourgeoisie and the dullwitted and frightened petty bourgeoisie in every country of the globe without exception.

All this makes up the content of the bourgeois-democratic revolution. The leaders of that revolution (or of those revolutions, if we consider each national variety of the one general type) 150 and 250 years ago promised to rid mankind of mediaeval privileges, the inequality of women, privileged state religions (or the "idea of religion," or "religiousness" in general) and the unequal-ity of nationalities. They promised, but did not fulfil their promises. They could not fulfil them, for they were hindered by "respect" for the "sacredness of private property." Our proletarian revolution had not that accursed "respect" for this thrice-accursed mediaevalism and for the "sacredness of private property."

But in order to render the achievements of the bourgeois-democratic revolution lasting for the peoples of Russia, we were obliged to go farther; and we did go farther. We solved the problems of the bourgeois-democratic revolution in passing, as a "by-product" of the main and real proletarian-revolutionary socialist work. We always said that reforms are a by-product of the revolutionary class struggle. We said—and proved by deeds—that bourgeois-democratic reforms are a by-product of the proletarian, i.e., of the socialist, revolution. It should be stated that the Kautskys, Hilferdings, Martovs, Chernovs, Hillquits, Longuets, MacDonalds, Turatis, and the other heroes of "Two-and-a-Half" Marxism,* were incapable of understanding this relation between the bourgeois-democratic and the proletarian-socialist revolutions. The first grows into the second. The second, in passing, solves the problems of the first. The second consolidates the work of the first. Struggle, and struggle alone, decides how far the second shall succeed in outgrowing the first.

The Soviet system is indeed one of the most graphic corroborations, or manifestations, of this growing of the one revolution into the other. The Soviet system represents the maximum of democracy for the workers and peasants and, at the same time, it implies a break with bourgeois democracy and the rise of a new type of democracy of world-historic importance, viz., proletarian democracy, or the dictatorship of the proletariat.

Let the dogs and swine of the moribund bourgeoisie, and of the petty-bourgeois democracy who follow in their wake, heap imprecations, abuse and derision upon our heads for the failures and errors committed in the building up of our Soviet system. We do not forget for a moment that we have indeed committed, and are committing, numerous errors and failures. Indeed, it is impossible to avoid failures and errors in a cause so new in the history of the world as the creation of a hitherto unwitnessed type of state structure. We shall undeviatingly strive to correct our failures and errors and to improve the application of Soviet principles in practice, which is still very far from perfect. But we are entitled to be proud, and are proud, of the fact that it has been our good fortune to begin the building of a Soviet state, and to begin thereby a new epoch in world history, the epoch of the domination of a new class, a class which is oppressed in every capitalist country and which is everywhere marching forward towards a new life, towards victory over the bourgeoisie, towards the dictatorship of the proletariat—and towards the emancipation of mankind from the yoke of capital and from imperialist wars.

The question of imperialist wars, of the international policy of finance capital which dominates the whole world, a policy that inevitably results in new imperialist wars, that inevitably results in an extreme intensification of national oppression, pillage, brigandry and the throttling of weak, backward and small nationalities by a handful of “advanced” powers—this question has become since 1914 the keystone of the entire policy of all countries of the globe. It is a question of life and death for millions of people. It is a question of whether 20,000,000 people (as compared with the 10,000,000 who were killed in the war of 1914-18 and in the supplementary “petty wars” that are still going on) are to be slaughtered in the next imperialist war, which the bourgeoisie is preparing, which is growing out of capitalism before our very eyes; it is a question of whether in that future war, which is inevitable (if capitalism remains), 60,000,000 people are to be maimed (as compared with the 30,000,000 maimed in the years 1914-18). And in connection with this question too our October Revolution opened a new era in world history. The menials of the bourgeoisie and its chorus, the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks, and the petty-bourgeois, allegedly “Socialist,” democrats all over the world, derided our slogan of “turning the imperialist war into civil war.” But that slogan proved to be the truth, the only truth—an unpleasant, blunt, naked and brutal truth, but the truth, as against the host of most refined jingo and pacifist deceptions. Those deceptions are collapsing. The Peace of Brest-Litovsk has been exposed. And every day exposes with increasing ruthlessness the significance and consequences of a peace even worse than that of Brest-Litovsk—the Peace of Versailles. And to the millions who are reflecting on the causes of the recent war and of the approaching future war the grim truth grows ever more clear, distinct and inexorable that it is impossible to escape imperialist war and imperialist peace (if the old orthography were still in use, I would have written both words mir,¹ with both their meanings) which inevitably gives rise to imperialist war, it is impossible to escape that inferno, except by a Bolshevik struggle and a Bolshevik revolution.

Let bourgeoisie and pacifists, generals and burghers, capitalists and philistines, faithful christians and the knights of the Second and Two-and-a-Half Internationals abuse that revolution in their fury. Their torrent of rage, calumnies and lies cannot conceal the world-historic fact that, for the first time in hundreds and thousands of years, the slaves have replied to a war among the slaveowners by openly proclaiming the slogan “Let us turn this war, waged by the slaveowners for the division of their plunder, into a war of the slaves of all nations against the slaveowners of all nations.”

For the first time in thousands of years that slogan has been transformed from a vague and impotent expectation into a clear and definite political programme, into an active struggle on the part of millions of oppressed people led by the proletariat; it has been transformed into the first victory of the proletariat, the first victory in the cause of abolishing wars and of uniting the workers of all countries against the union of the bourgeoisie of all countries, the bourgeoisie that makes peace and war at the expense of the slaves of capital, the wage workers, the peasants, the toilers.

This first victory is not yet the final victory. It was achieved by our October Revolution at the cost of incredible difficulties and hardships, at the cost of unprecedented suffering, accompanied by numerous serious failures and errors on our part. And, indeed, how could one expect a single backward people to frustrate the imperialist wars of the most powerful and most developed countries of the world without suffering failures and without committing mistakes? We are not afraid to confess our mistakes and shall examine them soberly, in order that we may learn to correct them. But the fact remains that for the first time in thousands of years the promise to "reply" to war between the slaveowners by a revolution of the slaves directed against all and every kind of slave-owner has been completely fulfilled—and is being fulfilled despite all difficulties.

¹ A play on the Russian word mir, which has two meanings: world and peace, the spelling of which was distinguished in the old orthography, but is identical in the new.—Ed. Eng. ed.

We started the cause. When, at what date and time, the proletarians of which nation will carry that cause to completion is not the essential thing. The essential thing is that the ice has been broken, the road is open and the path blazed.

Messieurs the capitalists of all countries, keep up your hypocrisy of "national defence"—the Japanese against the American, the American against the Japanese, the French against the British, and so forth! Messieurs the knights of the Second and Two-and-a-Half Internationals and the pacifist burghers and philistines of the entire world, go on evading the question of how to combat imperialist wars by issuing new "Basle Manifestoes" (on the model of the Basle Manifesto of 1912*). The first Bolshevik revolution has wrested the first hundred million people of this earth from imperialist war and from imperialist peace. Subsequent revolutions will wrest the whole of humanity from such wars and from such peace.

Our last—but most important, most difficult, and still most uncompleted—task is economic construction, the laying of an economic foundation for the new, the socialist, edifice, the replacement of the feudal edifice which has been destroyed and the capitalist edifice which has been half destroyed. In this important and most difficult of tasks we have suffered most failures and committed most errors. And how could one expect a task so new to the world to be begun without failures and without mistakes? But we have begun it. We are continuing it. By our "New Economic Policy" we are just now engaged in correcting a number of our mistakes. We are learning how to continue the building of a socialist edifice in a petty-peasant country without committing such mistakes.

The difficulties are immense. But we are accustomed to grappling with immense difficulties. Not for nothing have our enemies nicknamed us "hard flints" and exponents of a "bone-breaking policy." But we have also, at least to some extent, another art essential in revolution, namely, flexibility, the ability to effect swift and sudden changes of tactics if changes in objective conditions demand it, and to choose another path for the accomplishment of our aim if the former path proves to be inexpedient or impracticable at the given moment.

Borne on a wave of enthusiasm, having awakened first the political enthusiasm and then the military enthusiasm of the people, we calculated, with the help of this enthusiasm, to achieve directly economic tasks as great as the political and military tasks. We calculated—or perhaps it would be truer to say that we presumed, without sufficient calculation—to organise the state production and the state distribution of products on communist lines in a petty-peasant country by direct orders of the proletarian state. Experience has demonstrated our mistake. A number of transitional stages proved necessary: state capitalism and socialism, so as to prepare, by many years of work, for the transition to communism. Not directly relying on enthusiasm, but, aided by the enthusiasm born of the great revolution, and on the basis of personal interest, personal benefit, and business principles, you must set to work in this petty-peasant country to build solid little bridges leading to socialism by way of state capitalism. Otherwise you will never get to communism, you will never bring these scores of millions of people to communism. That is what experience has taught us. That is what the actual development of the revolution has taught us.

And we, who during these three or four years have learnt to make abrupt changes of front (when abrupt changes of front are needed), have begun, zealously, attentively and sedulously (although still not zealously, attentively and sedulously enough) to learn to make a new change of front, the "New Economic Policy." The proletarian state must become a cautious, assiduous and shrewd "business man," a punctilious wholesale merchant—otherwise it will never succeed in putting this petty-peasant country economically on its feet. Under existing conditions, living as we are side by side with the capitalist (for the time being capitalist) West, there can be no other way of transition to communism. A wholesale merchant would appear to be an economic type as remote from communism as heaven is from the earth. But that is one of the contradictions which in the actual conditions of life lead from a petty-peasant economy, by way of state capitalism, to socialism. Personal interest will develop production: and we must first develop production at all costs. Wholesale trade economically unites the millions of small peasants; it gives them a personal interest, binds them together and leads them on to the next step, namely, to various forms of association and union in production itself. We have already set about the necessary reconstruction of our economic policy. We can already count certain successes in this sphere, small and partial, it is true, but undoubtedly successes. We are already, in the field of this new science, finishing our preparatory class. By persistent and assiduous study, by subjecting every step to the test of practical experience, by not fearing to alter over and over again what has been already begun, to correct our mistakes and most carefully analyse their significance, we shall pass into the higher classes. We shall go through "the whole course," although the circumstances of world economics and world politics have rendered that course much longer and much more difficult than we should have liked. No matter what the cost, no matter how severe the sufferings of the transition period may be—despite disaster, famine and disruption, we shall not lose heart, and shall carry our cause to a triumphant conclusion.

October 14, 1921

OUR REVOLUTION *

A propos of the Notes of N. Sukhanov

I

I HAVE lately been glancing through Sukhanov's Notes on the Revolution. What strikes me particularly is the pedantry of all our petty-bourgeois democrats, as of all the heroes of the Second International. Apart from the fact that they are extraordinarily faint-hearted, that when it comes to the minutest deviation from the German model even the best of them fortify themselves with reservations—apart from this characteristic which is common to all petty-bourgeois democrats and was abundantly manifested throughout the course of the revolution, what strikes one is their slavish imitation of the past.

They all call themselves Marxists, but their conception of Marxism is impossibly pedantic. They have completely failed to understand the decisive feature of Marxism, namely, its revolutionary dialectics. They have not understood even the direct statements of Marx to the effect that in times of revolution the utmost flexibility is demanded. For instance, they have not understood, and have even failed to notice, the statement made by Marx in one of his letters—I think it was in 1856—expressing the hope of a union in Germany of a peasant war, which might create a revolutionary situation, with the working class movement—even that direct indication they avoid, prowling around it like a cat around a dish of hot porridge.

Their whole conduct betrays them as timorous reformists, fearful of making the slightest move away from the bourgeoisie, let alone breaking with it, and at the same time masking their cowardice by the most reckless rhetoric and braggadocio. But even from the purely theoretical point of view, what strikes me in the case of all of them is their utter failure to grasp the following Marxist consideration: so far they have observed a definite path of development of capitalism and bourgeois democracy in Western Europe; but what they are completely unable to grasp is that that path can be taken as a model mutatis mutandis, only with certain corrections (entirely insignificant corrections from the point of view of world history).

Firstly—the case of a revolution connected with the first imperialist World War. Such a revolution was bound to reveal new features or variations resulting from the war itself. For the world had never seen such a war, and under such circumstances. We find that to this very day the bourgeoisie of the wealthiest countries have been unable since the war to re-establish “normal” bourgeois relations. Yet our reformists, petty bourgeois who pretend to be revolutionaries, considered, and still consider, normal bourgeois relations to be the limit (which cannot be overstepped). And even their conception of “normal” is utterly commonplace and narrow.

Secondly, they are complete strangers to the thought that, while the development of world history as a whole follows general laws, that does not preclude, but, on the contrary, presumes, that certain periods of development may display peculiarities either in form or in order of development. For instance, it does not even occur to them that Russia stands on the borderline between civilised countries and countries which were for the first time brought definitely into the orbit of civilisation by this war, that is, all the Oriental, non-European countries; and that therefore Russia might and was indeed bound to reveal certain peculiarities, which, while of course following the general line of world development, distinguish her revolution from all previous revolutions in West European countries, and which introduce certain partly novel features in the passage to the countries of the East.

Infinitely commonplace, for instance, is the argument they learned by rote during the development of West European Social-Democracy, namely, that we are not yet ripe for socialism, that, as certain of their “learned” men express it, the objective economic premises for socialism do not exist in our country. It does not enter any of their heads to ask: But what about a people which finds itself in a revolutionary situation, such as that created during the first imperialist war; influenced by the hopelessness of its position, might it not fling itself into a struggle that offered it even a chance of securing conditions for the further development of its civilisation, even if those conditions were not quite the usual ones?

"Russia has not attained the level of development of productive forces that makes socialism possible." The heroes of the Second International, including, of course, Sukhanov, are as proud of this proposition as a chicken that has laid an egg. They keep repeating this incontrovertible proposition over and over again in a thousand different keys, for it seems to them the essential consideration in determining the character of our revolution.

But what if the peculiar situation drew Russia into the world imperialist war, in which every in any way influential West European country was involved; what if the peculiar situation placed her development in close proximity to the revolutions that were beginning, and had partially already begun, in the East; what if the peculiar situation enabled us to achieve the alliance of a "peasant war" with the working class movement, which no less a Marxist than Marx himself wrote of in 1856, in reference to Prussia, as one of the possible prospects?

What if the complete hopelessness of the situation, by intensifying tenfold the energies of the workers and peasants, offered us the possibility of proceeding to create the fundamental requisites of civilisation in a way different from that of the West European countries? Has that changed the general line of development of world history? Has that changed the fundamental relations between the basic classes of every state that is being drawn, or has been drawn, into the general course of world history?

If a definite level of culture is required for the creation of socialism (although nobody can tell what that definite level of culture is), why cannot we begin by achieving the prerequisites for that definite level of culture in a revolutionary way, and then, with the help of a workers' and peasants' government and a Soviet system, proceed to overtake the other nations?

II

You say that civilisation is necessary for the creation of socialism. Very good. But why could we not have begun by creating such prerequisites of civilisation in our country as the expulsion of the landlords and the expulsion of the Russian capitalists, and then start moving towards socialism? Where, in what books, have you read that such variations of the customary historical order of events are impermissible or impossible?

Napoleon, one recalls, wrote: On s'engage et puis on voit. Rendered freely that means: One must first start a serious engagement and then see what happens. Well, we first started a serious engagement in November (October) 1917, and then we saw such details of development (from the point of view of world history they are certainly details) as the Brest-Litovsk Peace, the New Economic Policy, and so on. And now there can be no doubt that in the main we have been victorious.

It never occurs to our Sukhanovs, not to speak of the Social-Democrats who are still more Right, that otherwise revolutions could not be made at all. It never occurs to our European philistines that subsequent revolutions in Eastern countries, which possess vastly more numerous populations, and are distinguished by a vastly greater diversity of social conditions, will undoubtedly display even greater peculiarities than the Russian revolution.

It need hardly be said that a textbook written on Kautskian lines was a useful thing in its day. But it is really time to abandon the idea that this textbook foresaw all the forms of development of subsequent world history. It is time to declare that those who think so are simply fools.

January 16-17, 1923

EXPLANATORY NOTES

EXPLANATORY NOTES

PAGE 3.* At the time of the February Revolution Lenin was residing in Switzerland. His first reaction to the telegrams containing news of the revolution took the form of two letters addressed to A. M. Kollontai and his "Theses of March 30 (17), 1917." The latter may be regarded as the first draft of the underlying principles of Bolshevik tactics in 1917. Somewhat later—between March 20 (7) and April 8 (March 26)—Lenin wrote his "Letters From Afar," of which only the first, reproduced here, the letter entitled "The First Stage of the First Revolution," reached its destination and was published in Pravda of April 3 and 4 (March 21 and 22). The remaining letters were not published in 1917. They first appeared in print in 1924 in the Lenin Miscellany, Vol. II, and now form part of Vol. XX of the Collected Works.

In the first of the "Letters From Afar," Lenin gives a description of the first stage of the revolution, reveals its motive forces, indicates its prospects, and lays down what were to be the tasks of the proletariat at this and subsequent stages of the revolution. The second letter is devoted to a detailed examination of the question of the Provisional Government; the third to the question of a proletarian militia; and the fourth to the question of peace. The fifth letter, entitled "The Aims of a Revolutionary Proletarian State System," was begun by Lenin on April 8 (March 26), the day of his departure from Switzerland, and was never finished. Nevertheless, Lenin was able in this letter to give a brief summary of the four preceding "Letters From Afar," the central ideas of which he embodied in the form of theses, calling the whole a brief "Programme" of the revolution. This summary we reproduce here in order that the reader may obtain an idea of the five "Letters From Afar" as a whole. "In the foregoing letters," Lenin wrote, "the tasks of the revolutionary proletariat in Russia at the present moment were outlined as follows:

- "1) To find the surest path to the next stage of the revolution, or rather to the second revolution, which 2) must transfer the power of the state from the government of the landlords and capitalists (the Guchkovs, Lvovs, Milyukovs and Kerenskys) to a government of the workers and poor peasants. 3) This latter government must be organised on the model of the Soviets of Workers' and Peasants' Deputies, namely 4) it must smash and entirely eliminate the state machine customary to all bourgeois states—the army, the police and the bureaucracy—and replace that machine 5) not merely by a mass organisation, but by a universal organisation of the armed people. 6) Such a government alone, such, that is, by virtue of its class composition (a revolutionary-democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry), and its organs of administration (a proletarian militia), is capable of successfully solving the extremely difficult, undoubtedly urgent, in fact, the main problem of the moment, namely, to secure peace—not an imperialist peace, not a deal between imperialist powers for the division of the spoils plundered by the capitalists and their governments, but a genuine, lasting and democratic peace, which is unobtainable unless a proletarian revolution takes place in a number of countries. 7) The victory of the proletariat is possible in Russia in the very near future only provided its first measure will be to secure for the workers the support of the vast majority of the peasantry in its struggle for the confiscation of the landed estates (and the nationalisation of the whole of the land, if it is assumed that the agrarian programme of the '104' [i.e., the agrarian bill of the Trudovik Group in the Second Duma, 1906.—Ed.] essentially remains the agrarian programme of the peasantry).

8) In connection with such a peasant revolution, and on its basis, it becomes possible and essential for the proletariat, in alliance with the poor section of the peasantry, to adopt measures for the control of the production and distribution of the most important products, for the establishment of 'universal labour service,' etc. These measures are inevitably dictated by the conditions created by the war and that in many respects will render the post-war period still more acute. In their totality and in their development, these measures would be a transition to socialism, which in Russia cannot be realised directly and immediately, without transitional measures, but which can be fully realised, and becomes vitally essential, as a result of such transitional measures. 9) In this connection, it becomes an extremely urgent task to organise immediately separate Soviets of Workers' Deputies in the rural districts, i.e., Soviets of Agricultural Wage Workers, as distinct from the Soviets of the remaining peasants' deputies. Such, in brief, is our programme. It is based upon an estimate of the class forces in the Russian and the world revolutions, as well as on the experience of 1871 and 1905." (Collected Works, Vol. XX.)

From the contents of the first of the "Letters From Afar," here reproduced in full, and from the brief summary given by Lenin of the four completed letters, the following fundamental factors stand out clearly:

1) In the main, Lenin here proceeds from the views on the prospects of the bourgeois-democratic revolution and of its growth into a proletarian revolution which he developed in the period 1905-07 (cf. Selected Works, Vol. III, "The Stages, Trends and Prospects of the Revolution").

2) Lenin connects these prospects with the specific features of the given moment (world and Russian imperialism, the imperialist war, the revolutionary situation in Europe, the overthrow of the autocracy in Russia, and the existence—side by side with the bourgeois Provisional Government—of the embryo of a workers' government in the shape of the Soviets of Workers' Deputies) and bases his "programme" of the revolution on that "close proximity" (as compared with 1905-07) of the aims of the bourgeois-democratic revolution in Russia to the aims of the proletarian revolution in Western Europe and in Russia of which he wrote in 1915 in his articles "The Defeat of Russia and the Revolutionary Crisis," "A Few Theses," and "The Two Lines of the Revolution" (Selected Works, Vol. V).

3) On the basis of this close proximity of the two revolutions, and while not for a moment overlooking the necessity of finishing the bourgeois revolution together with the whole peasantry by a "complete victory over the landlords," Lenin, in accordance with the conditions of the moment, declares that the main task is to pass (in alliance with the proletariat of Western Europe) from the first, the bourgeois stage of the revolution, to the second, the proletarian stage, and in pursuance of this aim to secure for the proletariat the support of the semi-proletarian masses of the countryside, in other words, the poor peasants.

PAGE 7.* Rumours of attempts on the part of both the German and the Russian governments to reach an agreement for a separate peace (i.e., a peace concluded independently of Russia's allies) began to circulate among bourgeois circles in Russia in the spring of 1915, and in the autumn of 1916 appeared in the foreign press. A separate peace was sought after by the political circles most closely connected with the government, and particularly by what was known as the "Black Bloc" which surrounded the tsar and the government. Apart from the communications with the German government which were conducted, for example, through the lady-in-waiting M. Vasilchikova in 1915, and subsequently, at the beginning of 1917, by the Tsarina Alexandra herself and by the tsar's minister, Protopopov, the intentions of the "Black Bloc" were revealed in that continual change of ministers which particularly distinguished the year 1916, and the aim of which was to create the possibility of a separate peace. It was in this way that bourgeois circles, the Cadets included, who were extremely dissatisfied with the efforts of the "Black Bloc," interpreted the appointment of Goremykin in 1915 and particularly of Stürmer in 1916 to the post of prime minister. When news of negotiations between the German and Russian governments appeared in the foreign press in the autumn of 1916, Lenin wrote an article in the Sotsial-Demokrat of November 6 (October 24), 1916, devoted to the question of a separate peace. In this article he explained the strivings of the tsarist government for a separate peace as being due to the interests pursued by the foreign policy of tsarist Russia. He declared that Russia was warring with Germany for the sake of Galicia, Armenia and Constantinople, and for the subjugation of the Balkan countries. But, Lenin said, "simultaneously with the conflict of predatory 'interests' between Russia and Germany, there is another no less—if not more—profound conflict taking place between Russia and England. The aim of Russia's imperialist policy . . . may be briefly defined as follows: to smash Germany's power in Europe with the aid of England and France in order to rob Austria (by annexing Galicia) and Turkey (by annexing Armenia, and particularly Constantinople), then to smash England's power in Asia with the aid of Japan and Germany in order to seize the whole of Persia, to complete the partition of China, etc." (Collected Works, Vol. XIX, "A Separate Peace.") This aim, however, could be fully realised only provided that Russia herself were not enfeebled. And the defeats she had suffered in the war against Germany had already enfeebled Russia. Hence the strivings of the tsarist government for a separate peace: "If 'we' run after too much booty in Europe, 'we' run the risk of exhausting 'our' military resources, of gaining almost nothing in Europe and of losing the opportunity of getting 'our share' in Asia. This is how tsarism argues," Lenin wrote, "and it argues correctly from the standpoint of imperialist interests." "It is quite possible therefore," Lenin goes on to say, "that tomorrow or the day after we shall wake up and hear the three monarchs [i.e., Russian, German and Austrian.—Ed.] proclaim: 'We, hearkening to the voices of our beloved peoples, have resolved to gladden them with the blessings of peace, to sign an armistice and to convene a general European peace congress.'"

PAGE 7. The scheme to dethrone Nicholas II and to crown his minor son, Alexei, while Michael Romanov, the brother of Nicholas II, was to be the real tsar with the title of regent, arose in bourgeois circles after the assassination of Gregory Rasputin in December 1916. This assassination was carried out by Purishkevich, a Black Hundred member of the State Duma, Prince Yusupov and Dmitri Romanov. It was regarded by the bourgeoisie as "a last warning" to the tsar and the tsarist government, but was not productive of the results they anticipated. The bourgeoisie, enraged against the tsarist government on account of the defeats suffered in the war and the attempts made by the government to conclude a separate peace, and at the same time mortally afraid of the approaching revolution, meditated the dethronement of Nicholas, in other words, a palace coup, in order to arrest the real revolution. Their object was to create a "cabinet of public confidence," which they had formally endeavoured to obtain by means of petitions to the tsar. Events turned out differently from what the liberal conspirators anticipated: the palace coup was forestalled by the February Revolution. Thereupon, instead of entirely abolishing tsarism, they endeavoured to set up a constitutional monarchy, putting forward Michael Romanov to succeed Nicholas II. The revolution thwarted this plot. Nevertheless, for the time being, it placed in power a bourgeois Provisional Government, the composition of which was practically identical with that which had been meditated by the progressive bloc when it hatched its plans for a palace coup.

PAGE 9.* Soon after the war broke out, the organisation of the Russian bourgeoisie, known as the Council of the Congress of Representatives of Trade and Industry, set up a committee to distribute government war contracts among the various manufacturers and their trusts, syndicates, etc. This committee was known as the Central War Industries Committee. Local committees of a similar kind were set up in all the important towns. In July 1915, a national congress of all these organisations was held, at which the rules governing these committees were drawn up and adopted. Later these rules were endorsed by the Duma and the tsar. Desiring to follow the example of the West European bourgeoisie, the Russian bourgeoisie tried to enlist the workers for active participation in the prosecution of the war "to final victory," and inserted a clause in the rules of these War Industries Committees authorising the workers to elect their representatives to them. The Bolsheviks carried on agitation among the workers urging them to boycott these committees, since they were a bourgeois trap, and at the same time carried on anti-war agitation at workers' election meetings. The majority of the workers did boycott these committees. The pro-war Mensheviks, who were in favour of the workers being represented on these committees, managed to induce only an insignificant section of the workers to send their representatives to them. With the aid of this insignificant section, the Mensheviks formed a "workers' fraction" on the Central War Industries Committee, notwithstanding the boycott of the majority of the Petrograd workers. At the head of the "workers' fraction" was the Menshevik Gvozdev, who subsequently became Vice-Minister for Labour in the coalition Provisional Government in 1917.

PAGE 13.* The "Farewell Letter to the Swiss Workers," written by Lenin, was adopted on April 8 (March 26), 1917, by a meeting of Bolshevik emigrants returning to Russia after the February Revolution, and was intended for publication in the Swiss Socialist press. This letter in essence reproduces the basic ideas of the first of the "Letters From Afar." But in the "Letters From Afar" attention is chiefly devoted to domestic problems of the Russian revolution, whereas here Lenin devotes attention chiefly to the international significance of the revolution. He regards this revolution as a corroboration of the international slogan of the Bolsheviks calling for the transformation of the imperialist war into a civil war, while in the further development of the revolution under the hegemony of the proletariat, i.e., in its proletarian stage, he sees the beginning of the international socialist revolution. The basic idea and significance of this appeal to the Swiss workers, and through them to all the workers of Western Europe, is contained in the slogan which concludes the letter ("Long live the proletarian revolution which is beginning in Europe!").

PAGE 13. The Zimmerwald Conference was held in the Swiss town of that name from September 5 to September 8, 1915. Attempts had been made by certain of the Socialist parties in the neutral countries to induce the International Socialist Bureau to summon a conference for the purpose of reviving the Second International. These attempts were, of course, fruitless. At a preliminary conference convened by the Italian Socialist Party held at Berne in June 1915, the representative of the Russian Bolsheviks insisted that only Left revolutionary Social-Democrats be invited to the forthcoming conference, but he was overridden by the representatives of the Italian and Swiss Socialists and of the Russian Mensheviks.

Among the countries represented at the Zimmerwald Conference were:

Russia (Bolsheviks, Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionary Centrists), France, Germany, Italy, Sweden, Norway, Holland, Poland, Switzerland and the Balkan countries. The Centrists and semi-Centrists had a decisive majority—over twenty votes as against the seven or eight votes of the Lefts.

The Lefts adopted a position which had been formulated by Lenin in June 1915. They submitted to the Zimmerwald Conference a draft of a manifesto to the workers of the world which characterised the war as a predatory war and pointed to the treachery of the Social-Democratic leaders. It called upon the masses to compel Socialist members of parliament to vote against war credits and to insist upon the retirement of Socialist ministers from bourgeois governments. It also appealed to the masses to fight for the overthrow of their governments.

This draft was rejected in favour of one submitted by the Centrist majority, which made no direct mention of the treachery of the parties of the Second International and the latter's collapse and was silent as to the revolutionary tasks of the working class. As Lenin wrote in November 1915 to Kollontai in America: "The manifesto of the Zimmerwald Conference is inadequate. Kautsky and Co. are prepared to accept it on the condition: 'Not a step further.' We will not agree to it, for it is sheer hypocrisy. . . ."

The Conference appointed an International Socialist Committee (consisting mostly of Centrists) to maintain contact between the parties and groups which had been represented at the Conference. To counteract the Centrist policy of the International Socialist Committee, the Left Wing at the Conference, on Lenin's initiative, set up its own bureau, which published the manifesto and resolutions of the Zimmerwald minority and conducted a systematic criticism of the Zimmerwald Right.

For an account of the struggle between the Lefts and the Rights at the Zimmerwald Conference, see Lenin, Selected Works, Vol. V, "Revolutionary Marxists at the International Socialist Conference, September 5-8, 1915."

PAGE 14.* This Social-Democratic Labour Group was formed by a number of Social-Democratic deputies in the Reichstag. The leaders of this group were Ledebour and Haase. In the beginning of June 1915, Kautsky, Haase and Bernstein, influenced by the revolutionary ferment among the masses, issued a manifesto declaring that, while at first Germany had been waging a defensive war, she was now waging a war of conquest. In December 1915, twenty Social-Democratic members of the Reichstag voted against the war credits, and in March 1916 the same group of deputies voted against the budget, whereupon the majority of the Social-Democratic fraction in the Reichstag, led by Scheidemann, expelled the group from the fraction. The expelled group then formed the Social-Democratic Labour Group. Like its leaders, Kautsky, Haase and Ledebour, the group occupied a Centrist position. Instead of organising the masses for revolution, it engaged in pacifist talk. Later, in 1917, the group, and the members of the Social-Democratic Party who were dissatisfied with the avowed chauvinist policy of the party leaders and who were affiliated to the group, formed a separate party which they called the Independent Social-Democratic Party of Germany. Subsequently the working class majority of this party left it and joined the Communist Party. The I.S.D.P. then affiliated to the Two-and-a-Half International, and later rejoined the party of Scheidemann and Noske and went back to the fold of the Second International.

PAGE 18.* The Stolypin agrarian "reform" consisted of a number of legislative acts passed by the tsarist government after the 1905 Revolution, in particular the laws of November 22 (9), 1906, and of June 27 (14), 1910, the fundamental purpose of which was to create a bulwark for tsarism in the countryside in the shape of a strong kulak peasantry. The agrarian policy of the tsarist government during the period 1906-14 is dealt with in greater detail by Lenin in his articles "The Question of the (General) Agrarian Policy of the Present Government" and "The Agrarian Question and the Present State of Russia" (Selected Works, Vol. IV).

PAGE 19.* The "International" group, which is also known as the Spartacus League, began to be formed immediately after the outbreak of the war around the persons of Karl Liebknecht, Rosa Luxemburg and Franz Mehring, who later became its leaders. But it did not assume definite organisational shape until the beginning of 1916, when Karl Liebknecht and his adherents were expelled from the Social-Democratic Party of Germany. It was then that the group assumed the name of "International" from the title of a magazine published by Franz Mehring in 1915. In the beginning of 1916 the group adopted as its platform the theses drawn up by Rosa Luxemburg, which contained all the errors that were peculiar to the German Lefts. In the autumn of 1917 the group began to publish an illegal magazine called Spartacus, from which the group later assumed the title of Spartacus League. In appraising the war as a predatory imperialist war, in rejecting the policy of "civil peace," in its estimation of the policy of the parties of the Second International and the collapse of the latter, in recognising that it was necessary to fight for the establishment of a Third International and to fight not only against the avowed social-chauvinists, but also the tacit social-chauvinists, viz., the Centrists, the International group adopted an internationalist, but an inconsistent and half-hearted position. It lacked Bolshevik and Leninist consistency in raising and solving problems. For example, the platform referred to above, written by Rosa Luxemburg, instead of the slogan "Transform the imperialist war into civil war" talks about the "political activity of the international proletariat, the fight for peace and bringing pressure to bear on one's own government." The International group sharply differed with Lenin and the Bolsheviks on the national and colonial question and adhered to the point of view of Rosa Luxemburg and Karl Radek, with which Comrades Bukharin and Pyatakov were associated. Notwithstanding sharp attacks on avowed social-chauvinism and Centrism, the group did not separate itself from them organisationally, but issued the slogan "We must win back the Party." In March 1917 the group discussed the question of affiliating to the Social-Democratic Labour Group formed by Kautsky, Haase and Ledebour, and decided to affiliate as an independent organisation. Later, it decided to retain its affiliation when the Social-Democratic Labour Group was transformed into the Independent Social-Democratic Party. It was only towards the end of 1918 that the group became convinced that this was no place for it. While participating in the Zimmerwald federation, it did not join the Zimmerwald Left led by Lenin. It was only at the end of 1918, after having broken with the "Independents," that the group took an active part in organising the Inaugural Congress of the Communist Party of Germany, which met in December 1918. After this Congress the Spartacus League became the principal part of the new party.

PAGE 21.* The article "The Tasks of the Proletariat in the Present Revolution" appeared in Pravda of April 20 (7), 1917, a few days after Lenin's return to Russia. The theses published by Lenin in this article were first announced in a speech he made on April 17 (4), 1917 (i.e., the day following his arrival in Russia), at a meeting of Bolshevik members of the All-Russian Conference of Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, then in session in Petrograd, and were repeated that same day at a joint meeting of Bolsheviks and Mensheviks. Unfortunately, no verbatim report was taken of either of these speeches, and all we possess are the far from exact and far from complete notes of the speech taken by one of the participants at the meeting of the Bolsheviks. In this article Lenin merely reproduces without further elaboration or argument the theses he announced and justified in the speeches delivered on April 17 (4).

The present theses have become known as the April Theses, and in the history of the October Revolution and of the Bolshevik Party represent one of those fundamental documents which set forth the programme of action and the strategy and tactics of the proletariat and the Bolshevik Party in 1917 during the process of transformation of the bourgeois-democratic revolution into a proletarian revolution. The April Theses follow logically from the attitude towards war and the forthcoming revolution in Russia which Lenin held as early as 1905 and reproduce the basic ideas of the "Letters From Afar" (cf. Lenin's summary of these ideas in the note to p. 3 *). But the April Theses set forth these ideas with particular emphasis and precision and supplement the programme of action given in the "Letters From Afar" both in the realm of politics and in the realm of economics. Essentially, the theses already contain all that Lenin subsequently, just before the October Revolution, said regarding the measures which must be adopted by the proletariat and its Party after they had assumed the power of government.

It should be noted that in Lenin's April Theses no mention is made of "a revolutionary-democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry" as a slogan. This presumably is due to the fact that, as Lenin points out in his "Letters on Tactics," this dictatorship had already been realised in a "unique" way by the February Revolution in the shape of the Soviets, interwoven with the power of the bourgeoisie in the shape of the Provisional Government. Its realisation in a pure form, without a bourgeois government, Lenin did not consider absolutely essential, under the circumstances existing in 1917, for the transition from the bourgeois revolution to the proletarian revolution. According to Lenin, it was now quite possible that the bourgeois-democratic revolution would grow into the socialist revolution, and that the socialist revolution would solve the problems left unsolved by the bourgeois-democratic revolution "in passing," as one of its "by-products," as Lenin expresses it. As we know, this is what actually took place in the October Revolution, which the Bolshevik Party approached with the demand for a dictatorship of the proletariat and the poor peasantry. Thus, the omission of the slogan of a revolutionary-democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry in Lenin's April Theses is intended to emphasise the fact that in 1917, as distinct from 1905, that slogan no longer defined the strategy of the proletarian party, since that party would now be working for a proletarian socialist revolution. This thought is elaborated in detail in the "Letters on Tactics," which were directed against Kamenev and those who shared his views, for they were marking time on the slogans of 1905 and were obstinately opposing the adoption by the Party of Lenin's line in the revolution.

In his speech "Trotskyism or Leninism" (November 1924), Comrade Stalin expresses the following opinion regarding the importance of the April Theses for the Party:

"In the new conditions of struggle a new orientation of the Party became necessary. The Party (its majority) gropingly proceeded to this new orientation. It adopted the policy of having the Soviets exercise pressure on the Provisional Government in the question of peace, and did not venture all at once to take any step beyond the old slogan of the dictatorship of the proletariat and the peasantry to the new slogan of the rule of the Soviets. This half way policy was intended to enable the Soviets to perceive the truly imperialist nature of the Provisional Government from the concrete questions of peace and thereby rip the Soviets loose from the Provisional Government. However, this position was utterly erroneous, for it begot pacifist illusions, poured water on the mill of defencism and hampered the revolutionary education of the masses. . . . A new orientation was necessary. Lenin gave the Party this new orientation in his famous April Theses. I do not enlarge on these theses, as they are known to all. Were there any differences of opinion between the Party and Lenin at that time? Yes, there were. How long did these differences of opinion last? Not more than two weeks. The All-City Conference of the Leningrad organisation (second half of April), which adopted Lenin's theses, was a turning point in the development of our Party. The All-Russian April Conference (end of April) only completed the work of the Leningrad Conference on an all-Russian scale, welding nine-tenths of its members to the unified position of the Party." (Stalin, The October Revolution.)

Upon the publication of Lenin's theses, Kamenev immediately came out against them in an article in Pravda entitled "Our Differences," in which he declared that "the general scheme of Comrade Lenin" was "inacceptable," and that "until new decisions by the Central Committee and resolutions of the All-Russian Conference are adopted" he and his fellow-thinkers would defend their position "both against the disintegrating influence of 'revolutionary defencism' and against Lenin's criticism" (regarding Kamenev's position at this period, cf. Lenin's "Letters on Tactics" in the present volume, pp. 31-44, and also notes to p. 31 * and p. 88 *). The resistance of Kamenev and his fellow-thinkers was smashed by Lenin and the Party at the Petrograd and the All-Russian conferences, at which Lenin's orientation was definitely adopted by the Party.

Thus we see that the Bolshevik Party welcomed Lenin's theses and adopted them as its programme. It goes without saying that Lenin's announcement of these theses was greeted with a furious counter-attack on the part of the bourgeois and petty-bourgeois parties. The theses served as a signal for a despicable campaign of calumny against Lenin (see note to p. 21 ) on the part of the bourgeoisie, including the liberal bourgeoisie. Plekhanov, as will be seen from the present article, characterised the theses as sheer "raving." The organ of the Menshevik central body (the Organisation Committee), Rabochaya Gazeta (Workers' Gazette), in an editorial on April 19 (6), sounded the alarm against "the danger from the Left flank." It declared:

"Lenin has returned to serve the cause of reaction. After his speech it may be said that any important triumph which may be gained by Lenin will be a triumph for reaction, and that it will be impossible to combat counter-revolutionary efforts and plottings until we are made secure against the Left flank and until by vigorous resistance we render innocuous the tendency of which Lenin has become the spokesman."

Rabochaya Gazeta regarded the "main danger from the Left flank" brought by Lenin as consisting in his announcement of the slogan of the transition from the bourgeois-democratic revolution to the proletarian revolution. This Menshevik paper wrote regarding Lenin's position:

"The main thing is that Russia, with her poorly developed productive forces, with an industrial proletariat that comprises a minority—and not a large minority—of the population, a proletariat which, moreover, is not possessed of any considerable political and trade union training and with negligible experience in organisation—the main thing is that this Russia shall have the possibility of proceeding to the abolition of the rule of capital and to the gradual realisation of socialism."

This the Menshevik paper and the Menshevik Organisation Committee regarded as a "stab in the back" which Lenin "was preparing" to deal the revolution. "The revolution is being menaced by an indubitable danger. Before it is too late, Lenin and his followers must be decisively rebuffed," the article in Rabochaya Gazeta concludes. The year 1917 showed whom the revolution was to decisively rebuff and who was to be thrown overboard by the insurgent proletariat.

PAGE 21. As we know, Lenin on the eve of the February Revolution was residing in Switzerland. Upon receiving news of the outbreak of the revolution in Russia, Lenin and the other emigrants were faced with the problem of returning to Russia. The problem was not an easy one, because the transit to Russia could be made only through the Entente countries—Great Britain, France, etc., or through Germany. Britain and France were not anxious to allow Socialists and opponents of the imperialist war to return to Russia, since they feared they might exert a disruptive influence upon the Russian army and working class. On the other hand, return through Germany, with which Russia was at war, might instigate a furious campaign of slander, as actually proved to be the case. Lenin fully realised this when he decided on the return through Germany. Therefore, as N. K. Krupskaya relates in her memoirs, Lenin endeavoured to arrange matters so as to preclude the slightest suggestion that a deal had been made with the German government, or even with the German Social-Democrats. Fritz Platten, a Swiss internationalist, before undertaking negotiations with the German government regarding the transit of the Russians through Germany, drew up a list of preliminary conditions for the passage through Germany, in which it was stipulated that the railway car in which the emigrants were to travel was not to be subject to examination or inspection; that nobody was to be allowed to enter or leave the railway car; that the passengers were to be accepted regardless of their views on war or peace; and that permission to travel was to be based upon an exchange for German or Austrian prisoners and interned in Russia. These carefully formulated conditions governing the passage through Germany were scrupulously observed. Immediately upon his arrival in Russia, Lenin, in the name of all those who had returned with him, made a communication to the Executive Committee of the Petrograd Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies stating all the circumstances and conditions of the journey from Switzerland to Russia; this communication was published in Pravda on April 18 (5). In spite of this, the whole bourgeois press immediately raised a rabid campaign of calumny against Lenin and the Bolsheviks. Lenin was declared to be an agent of the German imperialists, a German spy, and so on and so forth. The bourgeois and petty-bourgeois press outshone themselves in this campaign. In this they were in a large degree acting at the bidding of the British and French governments, which, having failed to prevent the return of Lenin to Russia, endeavoured to compromise him and the other Bolsheviks. On the day of Lenin's arrival memoranda were delivered by the British and French ambassadors to the Minister for Foreign Affairs, in which Lenin and the other Bolsheviks were described as extremely dangerous individuals and were libelled in the most unceremonious fashion. By these memoranda the Russian Provisional Government and the bourgeois press were in a way instructed to hound Lenin and the Bolsheviks. Such was the reception, accorded Lenin in 1917 by the Russian bourgeoisie. The proletarian masses of Petrograd, on the other hand, greeted their leader with the greatest exultation and revolutionary enthusiasm. At his first meeting with the revolutionary masses, in his speech to the vast procession of workers, soldiers and sailors who gathered to greet him, Lenin proclaimed the slogan of the socialist revolution.

PAGE 21. After the overthrow of the autocracy, social-chauvinism and its slogan of "defence of the fatherland" in the imperialist war took on a different hue. The Mensheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionaries now declared that to "defend the fatherland" meant to defend the revolution against German imperialism. Hence the term "revolutionary defensism." As a matter of fact, their defence of the revolution was a defence of the interests of the Russian bourgeoisie, which had now come into power. At first the masses supported the Menshevik and Socialist-Revolutionary slogan of revolutionary defence, for they honestly believed that their intention was to defend the revolution. For more detailed particulars regarding the "revolutionary defensism" of the Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries and the honest defensism of the masses, see Lenin's theses "The Tasks of the Proletariat in Our Revolution," §9 (pp. 52-54 in this volume).

PAGE 24.* The newspaper Yedinstvo (Unity) was originally founded in 1914 by a group of followers of Plekhanov (the "Party Mensheviks") and until the outbreak of the war was published legally in St. Petersburg. One of its principal aims was to combat the "schismatic tactics" of the Bolsheviks. Four numbers in all were issued before the paper terminated its existence upon the outbreak of the war. In 1917, after the February Revolution, it was revived by a group of Plekhanovists who called themselves the Yedinstvo group, and who, like Plekhanov, occupied an extreme social-chauvinist attitude towards the war, supported the bourgeois Provisional Government, defended the coalition with the Cadets, and carried on a furious agitation against the Bolsheviks, which at times did not stop at slander and even at informing. The chief figure on the paper was Plekhanov. The Yedinstvo group was small and its influence was negligible, although here and there in the provinces it had its groups consisting of social-chauvinist intellectuals. Subsequently, after the death of Plekhanov, the Yedinstvo group directly participated in counter-revolutionary combinations, supporting Denikin, Kolchak, etc.

PAGE 25.* The newspaper Russkaya Volya (Russian Will) was founded in Petrograd in 1916 by Protopopov, a member of the Duma and subsequently Minister for Home Affairs under the tsar, on funds provided by the big banks. It continued to exist until 1917, serving the interests of the big capitalists. In one of his contributions to Pravda in 1917, Lenin described this paper as "a servitor of the worst kind of capitalists."

PAGE 25. Lenin is referring to a report of his speech at the joint meeting of the Bolsheviks and Mensheviks on April 17 (4) printed in Yedinstvo the following day. After a very detailed exposition of Lenin's speech, the report goes on to say:

"This truly raving speech met with a deserved repulse from Tseretelli. He declared that the task of the moment was to consolidate the conquests of the democratic republic. As against the anarchist demagoguery cited above, he very aptly quoted the words of Engels, who said that there is no more certain path to ruin than the seizure of power."

Following on this report, Plekhanov published a long article in Yedinstvo devoted to the speech and the April Theses of Lenin and entitled "The Theses of Lenin and Why Raving Is at Times Interesting."

PAGE 26.* Lenin is referring to a number of letters and articles of Marx and Engels, in which they sum up the experience of the Paris Commune and formulate the innovations suggested by the Paris Commune which helped to develop and clarify the postulates of Marxism on the state and the dictatorship of the proletariat as developed by them prior to the Paris Commune.

In particular, Lenin has in mind Marx's letter to Kugelman of April 12, 1871, Marx's Civil War in France, written that same year, Marx's and Engels' Preface to The Communist Manifesto (1872), Engels' work The Housing Question (1872), Marx's "Comments" on the draft programme of the German Social-Democratic Party in 1875 (Critique of the Gotha Programme) and Engels' letter to Bebel of March 18-28, 1875, criticising the same draft programme.

Both Marx and Engels in these writings strongly emphasise the fact that the proletariat must smash the bourgeois state machine in the course of the proletarian revolution.

"One thing especially was proved by the Commune, viz., that 'the working class cannot simply lay hold of the ready-made state machinery, and wield it for its own purposes,'" Marx and Engels declared in their Preface to the German 1872 edition of The Communist Manifesto.

In his letter to Kugelman, Marx wrote:

"If you look at the last chapter of my Eighteenth Brumaire, you will find that I say that the next attempt of the French Revolution will be no longer, as before, to transfer the bureaucratic military machine from one hand to another, but to smash it, and that is essential for every real people's revolution on the Continent. And this is what our heroic Party comrades in Paris are attempting." (Marx, Letters to Dr. Kugelman.)

Marx, on the basis of the experience of the "comrades in Paris," i.e., the Paris Commune, described in detail in Chap. III of his Civil War in France

what kind of state the proletariat must build up after it has smashed the state machine of the bourgeoisie. Lenin reproduces and develops the ideas of Marx on the state in his State and Revolution, written in 1917, in which a separate chapter, Chap. III, "Experience of the Paris Commune of 1871; Marx's Analysis," is devoted to this question. Lenin repeatedly expressed himself on this question in the course of 1917. In the following article in the present volume, "A Dual Power," Lenin deals in particular with "a state of the type of the Paris Commune," and with the necessity of creating a state of this kind in the form of a Soviet power. Even before the February Revolution, at the beginning of 1917, while gathering materials for his State and Revolution, and while examining the views of Marx on a state of the type of the Paris Commune, Lenin wrote that the Russian Revolution of 1905 revealed, "more timidly," but "on a broader scale" than the Paris Commune, a new type of state, in the form of the "Soviets of Workers' Deputies, the Soviets of Railway Deputies and the Soviets of Soldiers' and Sailors' Deputies." And at that time he had already come to the conclusion that "one may, if you like, briefly . . . express the matter thus: the replacement of the old ('ready-made') state machine and parliaments by Soviets of Workers' Deputies and their representatives." "That is the crux of the matter!!" is his private marginal note in the rough draft.

PAGE 26. These words of Rosa Luxemburg's branding the betrayal of the interests of the proletariat and of socialism by the German Social-Democrats were uttered in connection with the vote of the Social-Democratic fraction of the German Reichstag on August 4, 1914, in favour of appropriating credits for the imperialist war. Regarding the treachery of the German and other parties of the Second International upon the outbreak of the imperialist war of 1914-18, cf. Lenin, Selected Works, Vol. V, "The Collapse of the Second International."

PAGE 27.* The article "A Dual Power," printed in Pravda on the day following the publication of Lenin's theses "The Tasks of the Proletariat in the Present Revolution," singles out the one "basic question of the revolution" from the questions dealt with in the "Letters From Afar" and the theses, viz., the question of power. Describing the "dual power" of which he spoke in the first of his "Letters From Afar" (pp. 3-12 in the present volume), Lenin regards the Soviets as an "embryonic power" of the type of the Paris Commune, and, in full accord with his fundamental slogan of the "transition from the power of the bourgeoisie to the power of the proletariat and the poor peasantry," declares that it is the task of "the class conscious workers" and of the Party to transform this "embryonic power" into a real power. It is characteristic of Lenin's position that he utters a warning against all foolhardy and ill-considered attempts to overthrow the Provisional Government without accomplishing the preliminary work of winning over a majority by combating the "petty-bourgeois poison-gas, chauvinist defencism, phrases, and dependence on the bourgeoisie." As against such foolhardy attempts, the article "A Dual Power" gives a general outline of Bolshevik tactics in the fight for "a state of the type of the Paris Commune," i.e., for a Soviet Republic, while in the following article "Letters on Tactics," Lenin expounds these tactics in detail.

The essence of the article "A Dual Power" is expressed in its concluding lines, in which the policy of establishing the undivided power of the Soviets to be pursued by the proletariat and its Party is set up against the intention of the bourgeoisie to establish its own undivided power. In this "basic question of the revolution," viz., the question of power in 1917, we have the continuation and further development of the two lines of the revolution—proletarian and bourgeois—of which during the imperialist war Lenin, in his article "The Two Lines of the Revolution" (Selected Works, Vol. V), wrote that they had from the time of the first Russian revolution constituted the distinction between the position and tactics of the Bolsheviks and the position and tactics of the Mensheviks. And while now, in 1917, the proletarian line found expression in Lenin's slogan, "All Power to the Soviets," the bourgeois line of the Mensheviks found expression in their hostility to this slogan, in their struggle against the Bolsheviks' line towards a dictatorship of the proletariat and in their defence of the power of the bourgeoisie against the proletariat.

PAGE 31.* As already stated in the note to p. 21,* on the day following the publication of Lenin's April Theses Kamenev contributed an article to Pravda entitled "Our Differences." Lenin's article "A Dual Power" was also followed by an article of Kamenev's entitled "Lenin's Theses," which was printed in Pravda on April 25 (12). In both these articles Kamenev, defending the position of the Right elements in the Party, who, somewhat later, expressed their views at the Party Conference of April 1917 (see note to p. 88 *), primarily protested against Lenin's fundamental slogan concerning the growth of the bourgeois revolution into a proletarian revolution through the undivided power of the Soviets.

In spite of the fact that in both articles Kamenev speaks of the "disintegrating influence of revolutionary defensism" and of the necessity for combating the latter, his own contributions to Pravda before Lenin's return to Russia were actually an expression of revolutionary defensism. In an article entitled "No Secret Diplomacy" (Pravda, March 28 [15]), he called upon the "free people" to "stand firmly at its post and return bullet for bullet and shell for shell," and not to permit "any disorganisation of the military strength of the revolution." On the question of how to secure the cessation of the war, Kamenev in the same article wrote: "Our slogan is to exert pressure upon the Provisional Government in order to compel it to come out immediately and openly before the democrats of the world with an effort to induce all the warring countries to start immediate negotiations for putting a stop to the World War. And meanwhile everyone must remain at his fighting post" (here and subsequently in this note the italics are ours.—Ed.). The demand that the cessation of the war be secured by exercising pressure upon the imperialist government of Guchkov and Milyukov, and the slogan "Bullet for bullet, shell for shell," were of course absolutely alien to Bolshevism. And, by aiming at these slogans, the first of Lenin's April Theses, which followed logically from his attitude towards the war, aimed as forcibly at Kamenev's position as it did at the "revolutionary defensism" of the Mensheviks.

On the subject of the Provisional Government, Kamenev, in an article entitled "The Provisional Government and the Revolutionary Social-Democrats," wrote: "Inasmuch as the Provisional Government is genuinely combating the survivals of the old regime, it may be assured of the definite support of the revolutionary proletariat." This attitude of supporting the Provisional Government "inasmuch as" virtually differed in no wise from the position of the Mensheviks; the very formula "inasmuch as" was a favourite formula of the Mensheviks. The third of Lenin's April Theses, with its slogan of "No support to the Provisional Government," here too aimed at the position of Kamenev no less than it aimed at the position of the Mensheviks. Kamenev's support of the Provisional Government was accompanied by his demand for "control" over the Provisional Government: "We call upon the revolutionary democracy, headed by the proletariat, to exercise the most vigilant control over every action of the government, both in the centre and in the provinces." This watchword was also in no way contradictory to the Menshevik attitude towards the Provisional Government, and was in fact being practised by the Mensheviks. Lenin's attitude towards the Provisional Government, which aimed at the latter's overthrow after a majority had preliminarily been won, could not be reconciled with Kamenev's demand for control, which was subsequently definitely rejected by the All-Russian Party Conference of April 1917.

Kamenev's whole policy during the spring of 1917 was to reject the transformation of the bourgeois revolution into a proletarian revolution, and this determined his attitude towards the Provisional Government. He regarded this transformation as a matter for the distant future, and therefore, as stated in the note to p. 21,* Lenin's "general scheme" was for him unacceptable. The most he expected in the near future was a revolutionary-democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry in a "pure" form. This was the general position maintained in his articles "Our Differences" and "Lenin's Theses." He was at a loss to understand how Lenin could speak of taking measures towards socialism, and resolute measures at that, "under the conditions of an uncompleted democratic revolution in a country economically the most backward in Europe and at a time when feudalism had not yet been eradicated in the countryside." He considered that the conditions and the times did not favour the taking of resolute measures towards socialism ("Lenin's Theses"). This fundamental objection of Kamenev's to Lenin's position fully coincided with the arguments advanced against Lenin's April Theses by the Menshevik Rabochaya Gazeta (see note to p. 21 *). Like the Mensheviks, Kamenev, who accused Lenin of failing to reckon with the existing relation of forces, in fact failed to reckon with it himself. For him it was as though the twelve years of capitalist development in Russia since the Revolution of 1905 had never been. World imperialism and Russia's entry on the path of imperialism, the imperialist war with all its consequences for Russia and for the relation of forces in Russia, and the specific features which distinguished that relation of forces and which found expression in the creation of a dual power by the February Revolution—it was as though all this did not exist for Kamenev. He applied to the conditions of 1917 the yardstick of 1905, and did so forgetting that Lenin had raised the question of “uninterrupted revolution” and of the growth of the bourgeois-democratic revolution into a proletarian revolution even in the conditions of the Revolution of 1905-07.

The article “Letters on Tactics,” which was written in answer to Kamenev and published in pamphlet form in April 1917, gives a careful and detailed explanation of Kamenev's mistake based on an analysis of the situation in 1917 as compared with 1905. At the same time the article sets forth what must be the fundamental tactics of the Party for the transition from the bourgeois revolution to the proletarian revolution, which in the main were developed in the first of the “Letters From Afar,” the April Theses and the article “A Dual Power.” Here Lenin introduces a new and extremely important thought in his description of the dual power. In his “Letters From Afar” he speaks of the second power, i.e., the power of the Soviets, as being the embryo of a workers' government. Here he states that in the shape of the Soviets was effected the revolutionary-democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and the peasantry, although in a peculiar way, i.e., interwoven with the dictatorship of the bourgeoisie.

These two statements may appear to be contradictory, but in fact no contradiction exists. The second statement merely explains and gives preciser definition to the first statement, since the revolutionary-democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and the peasantry, as Lenin pointed out as early as 1905, has its past and its future, and its future in fact lies in its transformation into a dictatorship of the proletariat. In that sense it, and therefore its expression in the shape of the Soviets, was “the embryo of a workers' government,” or, as Lenin puts it in his article “A Dual Power,” the embryo of a state “of the type of the Paris Commune.”

Lenin's thesis to the effect that the revolutionary-democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry had already been effected, although in a peculiar way, i.e., interwoven with the dictatorship of the bourgeoisie, left Kamenev and his friends not a leg to stand on.

While combating the Right opportunist position, Lenin in this article at the same time dissociates himself from the “Left” Trotskyists, who wanted to skip “the bourgeois-democratic revolution—which has not yet been completed and has not yet freed itself of the peasant movement,” i.e., the peasant revolution against the landlords. As a guarantee against this Lenin demanded the undivided power of the Soviets, in which the peasant masses were represented and which placed the proletariat at the head of these masses as the leader of the peasant revolution in the course of development towards proletarian revolution. However, not to skip the peasant revolution in 1917 did not mean for Lenin, as it did for Kamenev, that it was absolutely essential to pass through the stage of a "pure" revolutionary-democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry; still less did it involve, as it did for Kamenev, remaining in this stage for a long and indefinite period. The reason for this was that a complete victory over the landlords, while completing the peasant revolution, would at the same time be an essential link in the chain of transition to the proletarian revolution in the countryside; for under the conditions that existed in 1917 the completion of the peasant revolution could form part of the proletarian revolution as a by-product of that revolution.

PAGE 37.* The term "His Majesty's Opposition" was used by the leader of the Cadet Party, Milyukov, to describe the attitude of the Cadets towards the tsarist autocracy. He said that the Cadet Party was not "the opposition to His Majesty," but "His Majesty's Opposition," thereby emphasising the loyalty of the Cadets to the tsar. Applying this expression to the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks, Lenin implies that their attitude towards the bourgeois Provisional Government was as loyal and deferential as that of the Cadets to the tsar.

PAGE 37. The slogan "No tsar, but a workers' government" was put forward in 1905 by Parvus, at that time a Social-Democrat and Left Menshevik, and later served as a starting point for Trotsky's theory of permanent revolution. As has been stated in the note to p. 31 * of the present volume, Lenin in referring to this slogan dissociates himself from the Trotskyists, who ignored the peasant revolution against the landlords.

PAGE 38.* Lenin is referring to Marx's Civil War in France, dealing with the Paris Commune, and to Engels' preface to that book, written in 1891.

PAGE 39.* The reference is to Plekhanov's Anarchism and Socialism, originally published in German in 1894. Lenin gives a criticism of this pamphlet in his State and Revolution, Chap. VI, Section I (Selected Works, Vol. VII).

PAGE 41.* Twelve Years—a collection of articles by Lenin published in 1908. It was originally intended to appear in several volumes, but the very first volume, containing Lenin's most important writings during the period of the old Iskra and the Second Party Congress (i.e., down to 1905), was confiscated by the tsarist government.

PAGE 45.* "The Tasks of the Proletariat in Our Revolution" was written by Lenin a week before the Petrograd City Party Conference and two weeks before the All-Russian Party Conference (which were held in April and May 1917 and which endorsed Lenin's position), and appeared in pamphlet form in September 1917. The sub-title ("Draft of a Platform for the Proletarian Party") explains the character of the pamphlet. It is, in fact, a systematic exposition of a Party platform, i.e., a programme of action, strategy and tactics, in the transition from the bourgeois revolution to the proletarian revolution. It develops the platform already proposed by Lenin in brief form in his April Theses, the points which were presented most briefly and succinctly in the theses being now treated at greater length. For instance, the present article dwells in detail on the position of affairs in the Second International and the Zimmerwald alliance in 1917 and argues in favour of the establishment of a Third International, the initiative to be taken by the Russian Bolshevik Party. This section is, in a manner of speaking, a summary of all that had been written by Lenin during the period of the war on the collapse of the Second International and on the new Zimmerwald alliance and its Centrist majority (cf. Selected Works, Vol. V, Part entitled "The Collapse of the Second International and the Struggle for the Third International"). In similar detail it is argued that no alliance of any kind was possible with the social-chauvinist parties and currents of all shades, including, of course, the Russian Mensheviks, and that it was expedient to change the name of the Party from "Social-Democratic" to "Communist." The remaining points of the Theses of April 17 (4) are developed at corresponding length, particularly those which had not received detailed treatment in the articles written after the April Theses ("A Dual Power," "Letters on Tactics"), e.g., the question of the war and the question of revolutionary defencism. It need hardly be said that Lenin in these questions pursues the internationalist line which underlay all his writings during the period of the war.

PAGE 56.* This phrase is taken from a letter written by Engels to August Bebel dated March 18-28, 1875, and refers to the Paris Commune. Lenin deals with this letter, and particularly with the words quoted, in his State and Revolution (Selected Works, Vol. VII, Chap. IV, Section 3, "Letter to Bebel").

PAGE 57.* Cf. Marx, The Civil War in France.

PAGE 63.* Manilovism—sweet sentimental day dreaming, from the name of Manilov, a personage in Gogol's Dead Souls.

PAGE 64.* The vast majority of the members of the German and Austrian Social-Democratic Parties and of the French Socialist Party adopted a frankly chauvinist attitude, the minority a Centrist attitude (i.e., a concealed chauvinist attitude); only a few isolated members were internationalists. In the Italian party the Centrists (led by Turati and Treves) predominated over the open social-chauvinists.

PAGE 64. The Danish Social-Democratic Party and its parliamentary fraction adopted a social-chauvinist attitude from the very outbreak of the war. The leader of the party, and chairman of the parliamentary fraction, Stauning, became a member of the bourgeois cabinet during the war, and after the war became prime minister.

PAGE 64. The Socialist Party of America is an opportunist reformist party affiliated to the Second International. It was founded in 1900 following the split in the Socialist Labour Party. Daniel de Leon remained head of the Socialist Labour Party and Morris Hillquit became the leader of the Socialist Party together with Eugene V. Debs. The Left syndicalist group within the Socialist Party headed by Bill Haywood was expelled from the Socialist Party in 1912 for advocating direct action. During the war three currents developed in the party—an open social-chauvinist current headed by Victor Berger, a Centrist chauvinist group headed by Hillquit, and a Left-Wing group headed by Charles E. Ruthenberg. There was very little difference between the Hillquit Centrist group and the open chauvinist group in the party. The Left-Wing group headed by Ruthenberg became the nucleus for the Communist Party, which was founded in 1919. The majority of the membership of the Socialist Party followed the Left Wing, and in a referendum the membership voted for affiliation with the Communist International. Following the 1919-20 Wilson "red raids," the young Communist Party was driven underground and a large section of the Socialist Party membership that had come over with the Left Wing left the Communist Party.

PAGE 65.* Regarding the Zimmerwald alliance and the Zimmerwald Left, cf. "Revolutionary Marxists at the International Socialist Conference, September 5-8, 1915," "Proposals Submitted by the Central Committee of the R.S.D.L.P. to the Second Socialist Conference," and "Bourgeois Pacifism and Socialist Pacifism," and the notes to these articles in Selected Works, Vol. V.

PAGE 69.* The main slogan of the Zimmerwald Manifesto is the slogan "Fight for peace," but only a very vague reference is made to the revolutionary character of this fight. Towards the end of 1915 and the beginning of 1916 the discontent of the broad masses of the people found open expression in the spontaneous striving for peace. Kautsky in his articles and Huysmans in his speeches proclaimed the need for bringing pressure to bear upon the governments of the belligerent countries in order to induce them to conclude peace. In so far as the Centrist majority at the Zimmerwald Conference refused to declare that the struggle for peace could only be waged in the form of a struggle for a proletarian revolution, the difference between the Centrists who had affiliated to Zimmerwald and the Centrists who clung to the International Socialist Bureau practically disappeared after these articles by Kautsky and the speeches by Huysmans. Advantage had to be taken of this circumstance to expose the Zimmerwald Centrists and to accelerate the rupture between them and the Left, revolutionary Socialists in all countries. The Zimmerwald Conference could not develop into a new International as long as the Centrists imposed their line of conduct upon it. And the Centrists inevitably remained the masters in the Zimmerwald Conference as long as the Left Socialists in the West European parties lacked the courage openly to break with the Centrists, and as long as they restricted themselves only to criticising their inconsistencies and vacillations. The "Proposals Submitted by the Central Committee of the R.S.D.L.P. to the Second Socialist Conference," written by Lenin, and printed on the eve of this Conference in the Bulletin of the International Socialist Committee, No. 4, and after the Conference in No. 54-55 of Sotsial-Demokrat, June 1916, attacks the unnatural union between the Lefts and the Centrists. The main idea of these proposals may be formulated as follows: Without a split from the social-chauvinists of all shades, without exposing them, without a determined and consistent struggle against them, there can be no revolutionary policy, there can only be the clouding of the consciousness of the masses of the workers and the hindering of their revolutionary class struggle. Thus the "Proposals Submitted by the Central Committee of the R.S.D.L.P., etc." represented, on the one hand, a fighting platform on which to combine the really revolutionary elements at the forthcoming second Zimmerwald Conference and, on the other hand, a challenge to the Centrist majority of the Zimmerwald federation. The Centrists had to choose between proclaiming Kautsky's policy of "bringing pressure" upon the governments and the policy of the revolutionary mass struggle for the overthrow of these governments, the policy of proletarian revolution.

The second Zimmerwald Conference was held April 24-30, 1916, in the town of Kienthal, Switzerland, from which it became known as the Kienthal Conference. Forty-five delegates from various countries were present. Of these, twelve were Lefts, five to seven waverers who often joined with the Lefts, and the rest were Centrists. Thus in Kienthal, as in Zimmerwald, the Lefts were in the minority. But this time, owing to the pressure of the Lefts and the influence of the growing mass movement in all countries, the Zimmerwald Centrists shifted slightly to the Left. The resolutions of the Kienthal Conference were more clear and definite than those of the Zimmerwald Conference. But it did not bring about a rupture with the social-chauvinists. In a letter he wrote to Shlyapnikov dated May 1916, Lenin described the Kienthal Conference in the following words:

"The Kienthal Manifesto marks a step forward. . . . A resolution was adopted criticising pacifism and another resolution was adopted sharply criticising the International Socialist Bureau. On the whole, notwithstanding a host of defects, it is, for all that, a step forward towards a rupture with the social-patriots."

PAGE 72.* The reference is to the domestic loan issued by the Provisional Government to finance the war and known as the Liberty Loan of 1917. It was supported by all political parties except the Bolsheviks, who conducted a campaign against it. The loan was not successful.

PAGE 73.* Engels' "reaffirmation in a more popular form" of Marx's scientific arguments regarding the unsuitability of the name "Social-Democratic" for a workers' party is contained in Engels' preface, written in 1894, to a collection of his articles belonging to the year 1870 which was published under the title "On International Themes from the Volksstaat." In that article Engels "for the time being" reconciles himself to "Social-Democratic" as a name for the workers' party (it "may perhaps pass muster," he says), but emphasises the fact that this title "is unsuitable (unpassend) for a party the economic programme of which is not merely socialist in general, but directly communist, and the ultimate political aim of which is to overcome every form of state, and therefore democracy as well." (Our italics.—Ed.) These words are quoted by Lenin and discussed in detail in Chap. IV, Section 6 of his State and Revolution (Selected Works, Vol. VII).

By a scientific argument of the fact that the name "Social-Democratic" is unsuitable for a proletarian party, Lenin means that part of Marx's Critique of the Gotha Programme which points out that the proletarian party is in its economic programme communist, and that in its political aims it goes beyond democracy, striving, with the help of the dictatorship of the proletariat, for the extinction of every form of state with the abolition of all classes. The Critique of the Gotha Programme was written by Marx in connection with a draft programme for the German Social-Democratic Party proposed at the Gotha Congress of that party in 1875 and adopted by the Congress. At this Congress the union took place of the followers of Lassalle (the "Lassalleans") and the Marxists (known as the "Eisenachers"). Heedless of Marx's criticism, the German Marxists in the programme adopted by the Congress made a number of concessions to the Lassalleans, concessions entirely irreconcilable with Marxism, including a non-Marxist point on the state, which advocated that the transition to socialism should be effected by means of labour producing associations which were to receive credits from a "free state," i.e., a bourgeois state.

PAGE 75.* The reference is to the bourgeois national movement for the unification of Germany, which resulted in a united Germany with a constitutional monarchy, headed by a German emperor and with a German parliament (Reichstag). The movement was led from above, by the Prussian government; the King of Prussia became the German Emperor and Bismarck the Chancellor of the German Empire.

PAGE 77.* "Political Parties in Russia and the Tasks of the Proletariat" was written in April 1917 and published in pamphlet form in July of that year. In the 1917 edition we find the following insertion between the title of the pamphlet and the text: "An explanation of the draft programme drawn up by N. Lenin for discussion at conferences of Bolsheviks. Publication of the draft was delayed only because of the insufficiency of printing establishments in Russia." This indicates a direct connection between this pamphlet and the article preceding it in this volume, "The Tasks of the Proletariat in Our Revolution," which indeed is furnished with the sub-title "Draft of a Platform for the Proletarian Party." In fact, the pamphlet "Political Parties in Russia and the Tasks of the Proletariat" is a popular explanation of the draft.

PAGE 79.* The Contact Commission was set up by the Petrograd Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies in order to maintain relations with the Provisional Government and to exercise "control" over that government. It was a futile institution, a mere talkshop, which from time to time attempted to exercise persuasion on the Provisional Government. Questions which demanded urgent solution, but the solution of which the bourgeoisie and the Provisional Government found inconvenient, were shunted to the Contact Commission in the knowledge that there they would be safely shelved. For instance, the question of the return to Russia of the Socialist emigrants was several times referred to the Contact Commission without result. Lenin frequently expressed himself ironically and contemptuously of the Contact Commission as a model of petty-bourgeois compromise.

PAGE 86.* Regarding the Centre and the Centrists in the Second International during the imperialist war of 1914-18, see Thesis No. 16 of "The Tasks of the Proletariat in Our Revolution" (pp. 62-68 in this volume). For greater detail, cf. "The Collapse of the Second International," Lenin, Selected Works, Vol. V.

PAGE 88.* The All-Russian Party Conference of May (April) 1917 was held in Petrograd, after the Petrograd organisation of the Party, at its City Conference held on April 27-May 5 (April 14-22), had adopted in its resolutions (on the Provisional Government, the war, the attitude towards other "Socialist" parties, etc.) the point of view of Lenin and rejected the point of view of Kamenev and his followers. At the All-Russian Conference 151 delegates were present, representing 79,204 Party members. Nine sessions were held, at which the following questions were discussed: 1) The current situation—report by Lenin; 2) Borgbjerg's proposal (cf. Lenin, Selected Works, Vol. V, note to p. 311 *); 3) Reports from the localities; 4) The war—report by Lenin; 5) Attitude towards the Provisional Government; 6) The agrarian question—report by Lenin; 7) The Coalition Cabinet; 8) Revision of the Party programme—report by Lenin; 9) Report of the Petrograd Committee; 10) The national question—report by Stalin (cf. the speech by Lenin in this connection, Selected Works, Vol. V, pp. 307-12 and the corresponding note); 11) The situation in the International and the tasks of the Party; 12) Elections to the Central Committee. Resolutions were adopted on all these questions based in the main, as stated in the note to p. 45,* on Lenin's draft of a platform for the proletarian party (pp. 45-76 in this volume). The only essential departure from Lenin's position made by the Conference concerned the last point of the agenda. Lenin spoke against the resolution proposed by Zinoviev on this point. The basis of the divergence was a difference of attitude to the Zimmerwald alliance and its Centrist majority. In accordance with the point of view he expressed in points 17 and 18 of the theses "The Tasks of the Proletariat in Our Revolution" (pp. 45-76 in this volume), Lenin, contrary to Zinoviev, considered it possible to remain within the Zimmerwald alliance only for information purposes. He proposed this as an amendment to Zinoviev's resolution, which contained no such proviso. The amendment was rejected by the Conference and Lenin voted against the resolution as a whole. But on every question concerned with the revolution in Russia, the local organisations of the Party received from the Conference Leninist instructions for the conduct of their work, and from that time on the whole work of the Bolshevik Party throughout the country proceeded along the lines of Lenin's April Theses. For that reason the All-Russian Party Conference of May (April) 1917 was an extremely important one. Of decisive significance was Lenin's first report at the Conference, the report on the current situation, which is here reproduced. It gave the line for the labours and resolutions of the Conference. In his counter-report on the same subject, Kamenev advocated the views he had already expressed in connection with Lenin's April Theses in his articles "Our Differences" and "Lenin's Theses" (see note to p. 31*). He continued to urge that the line of the Party be based upon the completion of the bourgeois-democratic revolution. "It would be the greatest mistake," he said, "to draw . . . the premature conclusion that this revolution is not a bourgeois-democratic revolution and that it is approaching a socialist revolution." Lenin's idea that the fundamental aim of the Party must be to organise the proletariat into an independent class force supported by the poor peasants in order to transform the bourgeois revolution into a proletarian revolution was countered by Kamenev with "a bloc of the petty-bourgeois and proletarian forces" for the purpose of completing the bourgeois-democratic revolution. Lenin's demand that no support be given to the Provisional Government and that government be overthrown after a majority had been won by patient work of explanation and by exposing the government and its allies, the petty-bourgeois parties, was countered by Kamenev with a fruitless and essentially Menshevik demand for control over the Provisional Government by the Soviets. Kamenev could see no hope except in a bourgeois-democratic revolution, and declared that Lenin's policy of transition to a proletarian revolution contained no concrete indications as to "what we are to work for now and on what we are to concentrate our efforts." According to him, Lenin was proposing "explanation, but not action." Other participants in the Conference spoke in support of Kamenev and with similar criticisms of Lenin. Among them was Rykov, who was particularly emphatic in his defence of the Menshevik view that Russia as a backward country could not be the scene of the first socialist revolution. Rykov said:

"Can we reckon on the support of the masses in issuing the slogan of a proletarian revolution? Russia is the most petty-bourgeois country in Europe. It is impossible to count on the sympathy of the masses in a socialist revolution, and if the Party insists on the point of view of a socialist revolution, it will become transformed into a propagandist circle. The impetus for the socialist revolution must come from the West."

Rykov considered that the revolution could not change the bourgeois system in Russia. He said:

"We are faced with tremendous revolutionary tasks. But the accomplishment of these tasks will not be enough to change the bourgeois system."

Rykov concluded by again asserting that the objective conditions for a socialist revolution did not exist in Russia. He exclaimed:

"Where will the sun of socialist revolution rise? I consider that, in view of all the conditions, in view of our petty-bourgeois level, the initiative of the socialist revolution cannot be ours. We possess neither the forces nor the objective conditions, while in the West the question is approximately in the same stage as is the overthrow of tsarism with us."

Replying to Rykov in his concluding speech, Lenin said: "Comrade Rykov says that socialism must come from countries with a more developed industry. But that is not the case. Nobody can say who will begin it and who will end it. That is not Marxism; it is a parody of Marxism."

In the discussion on Lenin's report, among those who supported his opposition to the opportunist position of Kamenev and Rykov and their followers at the Conference was Stalin.

The Conference adopted Lenin's position and elected a Central Committee consisting of staunch Leninists (Lenin, Stalin, Molotov, and others).

PAGE 88. Regarding this crisis, cf. "Lessons of the Crisis" and "The 'Crisis of Power'" (pp. 129-32 and 133-35 in the present volume), and the notes to these articles.

PAGE 96. Lenin is referring to the "Manifesto to the Soldiers of All the Belligerent Countries," published in Pravda on May 4 (April 21), 1917. The manifesto was prefaced by an editorial remark to the effect that the manifesto "has been adopted by our Party" for publication in Russian, German and other languages for distribution at the front. The manifesto, in popular form, described the war as an imperialist, predatory war, and as a means of ending the war recommended a struggle for power on the part of "the revolutionary Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies" in the warring countries. "Brother soldiers," read the manifesto, "let us do everything in our power in order to hasten this and to achieve this aim. Let us not fear to make sacrifices—sacrifices on behalf of the workers' revolution will be not so hard to bear as sacrifices made in the war." The manifesto was signed by the Central Committee of the Party, the Petrograd Committee, and the editorial board of Pravda.

PAGE 99. Lenin is referring to the following words of Engels: "When we pass from joint stock companies to trusts which control and monopolise whole branches of industry, it is not only private production that ceases, but also planlessness." These words are contained in a letter to Kautsky dated June 29, 1891, in which Engels criticises the draft programme of the German Social-Democratic Party drawn up by Kautsky for the Congress of the party held in Erfurt in 1891. In this passage of the letter Engels defines one of the fundamental features of the highest stage of capitalism—imperialism, which was already taking shape in Europe in the 'nineties. This feature is capitalist monopoly, of which Lenin speaks in Chap. I of his book Imperialism, entitled "Concentration of Production and Monopolies" (Selected Works, Vol. V). Engel's words "private production ceases" imply that individual capitalists and their individual enterprises are being replaced by capitalist combinations, monopolies. And the statement that "planlessness" also ceases must be understood more or less in the sense of Lenin's statement that under imperialism "competition is transformed into monopoly" and that monopoly is the direct opposite of free competition (op. cit.). Capitalist combinations, by monopolising "whole branches of industry," put an end to competition inasmuch as they embrace the largest enterprises engaged in those branches of industry, but they do not abolish competition of an extremely fierce kind, viz., the struggle of these combinations (trusts, syndicates, etc.) among themselves and against individual enterprises still unabsorbed by them, in both the domestic and the foreign fields. And while, having monopolised production, they strive in the capitalist way to regulate and plan it in the interests of a small group of capitalist magnates, such regulation and planning is continually being frustrated by this competitive struggle. Of course, there can be no question here of the systematic planning of production which is instituted by the dictatorship of the proletariat. Production crises, with all their deplorable consequences for the proletariat and the toiling masses generally, remain the lot of the capitalist economic system even under imperialism; a living example of this is the severe world economic crisis which began in 1929.

Lenin deals in great detail with the quotation from the letter by Engels cited in this speech in his State and Revolution, Chap. IV, Section 4, "Criticism of the Draft of the Erfurt Programme" (Selected Works, Vol. VII).

PAGE 105.* The "Materials Relating to the Revision of the Party Programme" were compiled by Lenin in May 1917 and appeared in pamphlet form in June of the same year. Lenin's preface to this pamphlet makes it clear which passages are Lenin's own and which resulted from the labours of the All-Russian Party Conference of May (April) 1917 and were edited by Lenin. In his report at this Conference on the question of the revision of the Party programme, Lenin remarked that "the fact that it is utterly antiquated was pointed out in Party circles long before the war." All the more "antiquated" did this programme of the R.S.D.L.P., which had been adopted by the Second Party Congress in 1903, become as the result of the war and the February Revolution, when the development of world imperialism and the imperialist war faced the international working class movement with the necessity for a socialist revolution. The continued capitalist development of Russia along imperialist lines after the 1905 Revolution and her entry on the imperialist stage, the war and the "peculiar situation" created in Russia by the overthrow of tsarism, had also brought the proletariat of Russia up against the necessity for a socialist revolution. The preamble to the programme had now become inadequate. It spoke of capitalism, but gave no description of the highest stage of capitalist development—imperialism; it spoke of the inevitability of the collapse of capitalism and of a proletarian revolution in the more or less distant future, but did not treat that revolution and the struggle for the dictatorship of the proletariat as an immediate question. Similarly, the second part of the programme, the minimum programme, which formulated the aims of the proletariat in the bourgeois-democratic revolution, had also become inadequate, because it failed to foresee what was most important and fundamental, viz., the transition from a bourgeois revolution to a proletarian revolution, the "type" of state and state power corresponding to this transition, and other political and economic factors similarly arising out of this transition. Having adopted Lenin's platform of transition to the proletarian revolution, it behoved the Party to bring its programme into conformity with this platform. Lenin raised the question of the revision of the Party programme when he submitted his platform to the consideration of the Party in his Theses of April 17 (4). He also submitted this proposal to the All-Russian Party Conference of May (April) 1917, and at the same time, as will be seen from the preface to the present pamphlet, he submitted to the Conference a "Draft Revision of the Theoretical, Political and Other Sections of the Programme" (following the preface). The Conference set up a commission to work on the revision of the programme, and this commission in its turn divided into a number of sections. But neither the sections nor the commission as a whole were able to complete their work owing to lack of time, and upon the proposal of the commission, in the name of which Lenin reported, the Conference adopted the following resolution:

The Conference recognises the necessity of revising the Party programme along the following lines:

1) A description of imperialism in the era of imperialist wars in connection with the impending socialist revolution must be given; distortions of Marxism on the part of the "defencists," who have forgotten Marx's slogan "The workers have no country," must be combated.

2) The postulates and paragraphs on the state must be altered so as to accord not with the demand for a bourgeois parliamentary republic, but with the demand for a democratic, proletarian-peasant republic (i.e., a type of state in which there is no police, standing army, or privileged bureaucracy).

3) The antiquated portions of the political programme must be removed or corrected.

4) A number of points of the political minimum programme must be revised so as to more clearly specify the more consistent democratic demands.

5) The antiquated economic parts of the minimum programme and the points dealing with national education must be thoroughly revised in many places.

6) The agrarian programme must be revised in accordance with the resolution adopted on the agrarian question.

7) The demand for the nationalisation of syndicates, etc. which are mature for nationalisation must be inserted.

8) A description of the main currents in present-day Socialism must be added.

The Conference enjoins the Central Committee to draw up a draft Party programme on these lines within two months and to submit it to the Party Congress for ratification.

The Conference calls upon all organisations and Party members to discuss the draft programmes, to amend them and to draw up their counter-proposals.

After the Conference, and on the basis of the materials of the Conference, Lenin drew up a complete draft programme (pp. 111-24 in the present volume), in which he included his "Draft Revision of the Theoretical, Political and Other Sections of the Programme" originally submitted to the Conference, and, upon the instructions of the Central Committee, published it together with other materials in the form of the present pamphlet.

PAGE 108.* Lenin is referring to his article "One Question of Principle," printed in No. 68 of Pravda, in which he expressed his views on the conflict that had taken place between the Kronstadt Soviet and the Provisional Government.

The conflict arose from the fact that the Kronstadt Soviet, in which the Bolsheviks enjoyed considerable influence, on May 30 (17) passed a resolution abolishing the post of government commissar and declaring the entire power to belong to the Kronstadt Soviet. It was stated in the resolution that: "The sole power in the city of Kronstadt shall be the Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, which on all matters of state importance shall establish direct contact with the Petrograd Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies." For this resolution the Kronstadt Soviet was accused by the Provisional Government of "defection from the Russian state." Chkheidze, Gotz, Tseretelli, Skobelev and others were sent to Kronstadt to regulate the conflict. The conflict was settled by an agreement, according to which the commissar was to be elected by the Kronstadt Soviet and confirmed by the Provisional Government. On this subject Lenin wrote in the article referred to:

"The Kronstadt incident has raised an important question, a question of principle and programme, which no honest democrat, not to say Socialist, can regard with indifference. That is the question of the right of the central power to confirm official persons elected by the local population."

The Mensheviks, to whose number Tseretelli and Skobelev belonged, in sponsoring the resolution to the effect that the political commissar elected by the Kronstadt Soviet shall be confirmed by the Provisional Government, forgot that this was a violation of democratic principles. Lenin, therefore, reminded them of "the opinion of a writer who even in the eyes of Tseretelli and Skobelev has probably not entirely lost his authority as a scientist and Marxist." "That writer is Frederick Engels," Lenin informed the Mensheviks. In a letter to Kautsky dated June 29, 1891 (see note to p. 99 *), Engels, criticising the draft programme for the German party drawn up by Kautsky, categorically denied the right of the central state power to appoint county and provincial commissars (Statthalter, Präfekte, Landräte and Regierungsräte). He accordingly proposed that the following point should be included in the minimum programme of the German Social-Democratic Party: "Complete self-government for the provinces, districts and communities through officials elected by universal suffrage. The abolition of all local and provincial authorities appointed by the state." Lenin in his draft proposes to embody the sentence we have italicised in the minimum programme of the Bolshevik Party in Engels' precise words.

PAGE 110.* These were the comments of the section of the commission on the revision of the programme which at the All-Russian Party Conference of May (April) 1917 examined Lenin's draft supplement to the general preamble of the old programme (pp. 106-07 in the present volume). This section consisted of Bogolepov, Oppokov and Sokolnikov (the latter made the report to the Conference on behalf of the section), who were essentially at variance with Lenin's view. The section considered that "the mere addition to the preamble to the programme" of that which Lenin proposed to add "would be a purely mechanical union, frequently not co-ordinated with the line of argument of the preamble to our programme." The section considered that the preamble to the programme should be altered so as to confine it to the question of imperialism. The section considered superfluous any reference in the programme to pre-imperialist capitalism, as though imperialism had absorbed all preceding stages in the development of capitalism, and as though under imperialism all the peculiarities of capitalism disappeared, e.g., exchange, commodity production, crises, etc. The section overlooked the fact that imperialism arises out of these peculiarities, that it is everywhere to be found existing side by side with pre-imperialist stages in the development of capitalism, that this is true of all countries, but that it is particularly true of Russia, where the embryonic forms of imperialism existed side by side not only with pre-imperialist phases in the development of capitalism, but even with pre-capitalist economic forms. In the present arguments Lenin categorically objects to these comments. Subsequently, in October, when in defence of the point of view of the section, with all the consequences that followed therefrom, a collection of articles by Milyutin, Sokolnikov, Lomov and Smirnov was published in Moscow also entitled "Materials Relating to the Revision of the Party Programme," and when an identical point of view was expressed by Bukharin in the Moscow journal Spartak, Lenin in Prosveshchenie (Enlightenment), No. 1-2, published a long article entitled "The Revision of the Party Programme," in which he subjected the "Left" position to a detailed criticism. At the Eighth Party Congress (held in 1919), during the discussion and adoption of the new Party programme, Bukharin defended the same position as that adopted by the section at the Conference of 1917. He also demanded that the preamble to the programme should be altered so as to have it deal entirely with imperialism. Together with Pyatakov he opposed Lenin's point of view on the national question, continuing to pursue the "Left" line which was pursued by both during the imperialist war down to 1917, and by Pyatakov and others at the All-Russian Party Conference in 1917.

PAGE 125.* The article "The Problem of Uniting the Internationalists," which appeared in Pravda of May 31 (18), 1917, was written by Lenin in connection with the suggestion of merging into the Bolshevik Party the group of Petrograd internationalists known as the Inter-Regionalists. Such an amalgamation was consistent with Lenin's position, which was adopted by the Petrograd Conference and the All-Russian Conference of the Party in April 1917. The All-Russian Conference, in its resolution on "A Union of Internationalists Against the Petty-Bourgeois Bloc," categorically denied any possibility of unity with parties or groups which advocated the policy of "revolutionary defencism," or of "supporting the Provisional Government, which represents the interests of capital." It was all the more essential to emphasise in the decisions of the Conference this consistently Bolshevik attitude towards the defencists of all shades, since, as was apparent from the reports to the Conference made by the local organisations, in the provinces dissociation from the Mensheviks had not everywhere been effected and there were within the R.S.D.L.P. a number of joint organisations of Bolsheviks and Mensheviks. But as regards groups and tendencies that were internationalist both in word and deed, the Conference, as will be seen from the beginning of the present article, considered "closer relations and amalgamation" possible on the basis of a rupture with "revolutionary defencism" and with "the policy of petty-bourgeois betrayal of socialism" in general. The Inter-Regionalists came under those "groups and tendencies" with which unity on such a basis was considered possible. This organisation of "United Social-Democratic Internationalists," as they called themselves, regarded themselves as "non-factional." The group consisted of a number of former Trotskyists, a number of former Vperyod-ists and a number of "Party Mensheviks" (i.e., former Plekhanovists who had broken with Plekhanov when he became a social-chauvinist). On the question of war and revolution the Inter-Regionalists on the whole maintained an internationalist position, although they betrayed certain vacillations in the direction of Centrism, which was what chiefly held them aloof from the Bolsheviks and prevented their final rupture with Menshevism. The Inter-Regionalists enjoyed a certain amount of influence among the workers of Petrograd and counted several hundred working class members at the beginning of the 1917 Revolution. Among them were certain prominent revolutionary figures, e.g., M. S. Uritsky and V. Volodarsky, both of whom later (in 1918) fell victim to the White (Socialist-Revolutionary) Terror. The question of uniting with the Bolshevik Party was discussed at a Conference of the Inter-Regionalists held on May 23 (10), 1917, at which Lenin was present on behalf of the Central Committee of the Bolshevik Party. The resolution in favour of union proposed by Lenin at this Conference met with opposition on the part of Trotsky, who not long previously had returned from abroad and had joined the Inter-Regionalist organisation. Lenin's notes of the more salient points of Trotsky's speech delivered at this Conference are extant. These notes show that Trotsky demanded as a preliminary condition to union the summoning of "a broad Party congress," under the joint aegis of the Bolsheviks, the Inter-Regionalists and the Menshevik-Internationalists (the Martov group—see note to p. 125 ). Moreover, Trotsky, while agreeing that the resolution of the All-Russian Conference of the Bolsheviks of May (April) 1917 might serve as the basis for union, declared that at the same time "the recognition of Bolshevism cannot be demanded of us" (i.e., of Trotsky and the Inter-Regionalists), since he agreed with the Bolshevik resolutions only "to the extent that Russian Bolshevism has become internationalised." "The Bolsheviks," he explained, "have become de-Bolshevised—and I cannot call myself a Bolshevik." By such unblushing libels, which were subsequently repeated in other forms (for example, in 1922 in one of the explanatory notes to his book 1905, where he declares that Bolshevism in the spring of 1917 "re-armed itself"), Trotsky endeavoured to conceal the collapse of his own "theories." At the same time, these phrases patently reveal the real attitude of Trotsky towards the Bolshevik Party at that period, when he was coming closer to the latter and finally joined its ranks. In May 1917 even the best of the Inter-Regionalists were unable to discern the true meaning of the speeches delivered by Trotsky at their Conference. The Conference supported Trotsky (cf. in the present article Trotsky's resolution adopted at this Conference). It was only the subsequent development of events in 1917 that brought the Inter-Regionalists unconditionally into the Bolshevik Party at the Sixth Party Congress.

PAGE 125. The "Mensheviks who follow Martov," who called themselves Menshevik-Internationalists, in 1917 formed the Left Wing of the Menshevik Party and were in opposition to its central body, the Organisation Committee.

While they were still a long way from being consistent internationalists, since they were essentially Centrists, they were nevertheless hostile to the "revolutionary defensism" of the majority of the Menshevik Party. They were opposed to unconditionally supporting the Provisional Government, which was the policy of the majority of the party, just as they were opposed to joining that government when, in May 1917, a coalition cabinet of Cadets, Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries was formed. The oscillations among the Menshevik-Internationalists towards the Left were at times considerable. After the events of July 1917, Martov and his followers began the publication of a Left Menshevik paper entitled Iskra, in which they at one time supported the demand for the transfer of the power of government to the Soviets. In the end, the more Left of the Menshevik-Internationalists succeeded (this was also after the July events) in breaking with Menshevism organisationally and ideologically and joined the Bolshevik Party. This, for instance, was the case with Larin. On the other hand, Martov and his immediate followers remained for ever tied to the Menshevik Party and together with the latter went over to the camp of counter-revolution after the October Revolution.

PAGE 125. Priboy (The Surf)—a legal Bolshevik publishing house in Petrograd, founded before the revolution and revived in 1917.

Prosveshchenie (Enlightenment)—a legal Bolshevik journal published between the years 1911 and 1914. It was revived in 1917, but only one number was issued.

PAGE 126.* The reference is to the resolutions of the Party Conference of December 1908, the 1910 Plenum of the Central Committee, the Prague Party Conference of 1912 and the consultation between the Central Committee and Party workers held in 1913 in Poronino, known as the August Conference. More on this subject will be found in Lenin's writings: "On to the Highroad," "Draft Resolution on the Present Situation and the Tasks of the Party," "Notes of a Publicist," "Excerpts from the Resolutions of the Prague Conference of the R.S.D.L.P." and "Controversial Questions," and the notes on these articles, in Selected Works, Vol. IV.

PAGE 129.* The article "Lessons of the Crisis" appeared in Pravda of May 6 (April 23), and was written in connection with the following events.

On May 1 (April 18), Milyukov, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, transmitted a telegraphic note to the Allied governments in which, in the name of the Provisional Government, he announced that it was "the national desire to fight the World War to a victorious conclusion" and the intention of the government "to observe the obligations assumed in relation to our allies." This note in fact nullified the manifesto of the Provisional Government to the citizens of Russia of April 9 (March 27), in which it was declared, falsely and hypocritically, it is true, that for Russia the war bore a defensive character and that Russia renounced the policy of forcible annexations of foreign territory. The masses felt that they had been deceived and began to stir.

When the note appeared in the press on the morning of May 3 (April 20), the Finland Regiment came out on to the streets fully armed and marched to the Mariinsky Palace, the headquarters of the Provisional Government. They were followed by the Moscow Regiment, the Pavlovsky Regiment, the 180th Reserve Regiment, the Kexholm Regiment and the garrison of the Second Baltic Fleet—from 25,000 to 30,000 men in all. The movement was a spontaneous one, since the initiative had not been taken by a single political organisation. These regiments demonstrated not so much against the Provisional Government as against Milyukov personally and his policy of conquest.

After some time the compromising Menshevik and Socialist-Revolutionary leaders of the Soviet succeeded in persuading the soldiers to return to their barracks.

On the evening of the same day, when the Provisional Government was in joint session with representatives of the Executive Committee of the Petrograd Soviet, columns of workers on the one hand and, on the other, a counter-demonstration of the bourgeoisie, organised by the Cadet Party in support of Milyukov and the Provisional Government, began to move towards the centre of the city.

At the joint session, the Provisional Government endeavoured to intimidate the representatives of the Executive Committee—the Mensheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionaries—by referring to the difficulties the country was experiencing and by threatening to resign, thereby hoping to extort the greatest possible concessions. In the end, having met with a refusal on the part of the Provisional Government to withdraw Milyukov's note, the representatives of the Executive Committee consented to the publication of an official "explanation" by the government. This communiqué of the Provisional Government appeared on May 18 (5) and alleged that the purpose of Milyukov's note was "to achieve the aims which were set forth in the government's declaration of April 9 (March 28) and expressed in the following terms: 'The Provisional Government regards it as its duty and privilege this day to declare that the aim of free Russia is not to dominate over other nations, nor to deprive them of their national possessions, nor to violently seize foreign territories, but to establish a lasting peace on the basis of the self-determination of nations. The Russian people is not striving for the enhancement of its foreign power at the expense of other peoples, its aim is not to enslave or humiliate anybody. In the name of the supreme principles of justice it has unfettered the Polish people. But the Russian people will not permit Russia to emerge from the great struggle humiliated and with her vital forces undermined.'"

Early the following morning, masses of workers in organised formation and bearing banners with the Bolshevik slogans, "All power to the Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies" and "Long live the Third International," began to march from the working class quarters of Petrograd, particularly the Viborg district, towards the centre of the city. To this point too, and again as a counter-demonstration, there surged armed officers, military cadets (Junkers) and students bearing the slogans "Confidence in the Provisional Government," "Down with Lenin" and "Long live Milyukov."

Collisions took place between the demonstrating workers and the counter-revolutionaries, accompanied by exchanges of shots, which resulted in several casualties. It was the Junkers who started the attack on the workers' demonstration. On the Palace Square, General Kornilov endeavoured to collect reliable troops in order to settle with the workers, but without success, since the Executive Committee of the Soviet had sent a telephone message to all the barracks forbidding any movement of troops without the sanction of the Soviet.

That same day—May 4 (April 21)—the Executive Committee of the Petrograd Soviet, upon the report of the Menshevik Tseretelli and by a majority of thirty-four to nineteen, passed a motion of confidence in the Provisional Government and thereby recognised the incident as closed.

The plenary meeting of the Soviet, which was summoned that same day, expressed its agreement with the position of the Menshevik and Socialist-Revolutionary majority of the Executive Committee and rejected the proposal of the Bolshevik fraction to create a Socialist government from among the Socialist parties. Furthermore, the Soviet, by a unanimous decision, recommended all the Socialist parties and the workers and soldiers to refrain from all street demonstrations for two days. On May 5 (April 22) all was quiet on the streets. But the calm was merely on the surface. The events of May 3-4 (April 20-21) marked the beginning of a movement among the working class masses in hostility to the bourgeois Provisional Government and in favour of the sole power of the Soviets. These events were symptomatic of the crisis of dual power. They corroborated Lenin's words that the only escape from duality of power for the working class was that the power should pass to the Soviets. But on May 3-4 (April 20-21) the Bolshevik Party still did not possess a majority among the working class masses. And therefore the Central Committee of the Party, under Lenin's leadership, displayed a firm restraint on these days. A number of the leaders of the Petrograd Committee of the Party during these days issued the slogan "Down with the Provisional Government," which, in view of the existing situation, was a premature appeal for the immediate overthrow of that government. It was an immediate overthrow that the group of "Lefts" in the Petrograd Party Committee had in mind and so they meditated the arrest of the Provisional Government. The Central Committee of the Party put a decisive stop to what, under the existing circumstances, would have been a foolhardy attempt. "The Central Committee," Stalin says, "was absolutely united on this question, condemning the attempt of a group of comrades to arrest the Provisional Government at a time when the Bolsheviks constituted a minority both in the Soviets and in the army." (Stalin, "Trotskyism or Leninism," The October Revolution.) The Central Committee, in its resolution of May 5 (April 22), written by Lenin, recognised that the slogan "Down with the Provisional Government" under these conditions was a wrong one, and declared that "unless there is a solid

(i.e., class conscious and organised) majority of the people on the side of the revolutionary proletariat it is either a mere phrase or, objectively, leads to attempts of a foolhardy character." "We shall favour the transfer of power to the proletarians and semi-proletarians," the resolution goes on to say, "only when the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies come to adopt our policy and are willing to take that power into their own hands." At the same time, the resolution recorded that "the organisation of our Party, the consolidation of proletarian forces, proved to be obviously inadequate in the days of the crisis." The resolution proposed as the "slogans of the moment": 1) To explain the proletarian line and the proletarian way to end the war; 2) To criticise the petty-bourgeois policy of confidence in and compromise with the government of capitalists; 3) To conduct propaganda and agitation from group to group within every regiment and in every factory, particularly among the most backward masses—domestic servants, unskilled labourers, etc.—for it was particularly among them that the bourgeoisie tried to find support during the days of the crisis; 4) To organise the proletariat, again to organise the proletariat, and once more to organise the proletariat—in every factory, in every district, in every city quarter.

During the events themselves, the Central Committee, in its resolution of May 4 (April 21), which was also written by Lenin, states that "Party agitators and speakers must refute the abominable lies of the capitalist papers, and of the papers which support the capitalists, to the effect that we are threatening civil war." The resolution goes on to say: "This is a lie, for at the present moment, when the capitalists and their government cannot and dare not use violence against the masses, when the mass of soldiers and workers are giving free expression to their will, freely electing and replacing all authorities—at such a moment any thought of civil war is naive, senseless, outrageous; at this moment, there must be subordination to the will of the majority of the population and free criticism of the will of the majority by the discontented minority; if acts of violence ensue, the responsibility will lie with the Provisional Government and its supporters." At the end of the resolution, referring to the policy of confidence in the Provisional Government pursued by the "leaders of the Soviet," the Central Committee declares that this policy is "profoundly mistaken" and threatens a "breach between the will of the Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies and the will of the majority of the revolutionary soldiers at the front and in Petrograd and the majority of the workers." As to "those workers and soldiers who recognise that the Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies must change its policy," the Central Committee called upon them "to hold new elections of delegates" to the Soviet and "to send only such delegates as will steadfastly pursue a definite idea in conformity with the will of the majority." (Lenin, Collected Works, Vol. XX.) This appeal to hold new elections of the delegates to the Soviet is repeated in the resolution of the Central Committee of May 5 (April 22) cited above.

Lenin's article "Lessons of the Crisis" excellently facilitated "a thorough discussion" on the part of the workers and soldiers "of the results of the crisis of the last two days" for which the resolution of the Central Committee called in its conclusion. The article presents a picture of the events of those days, explains the nature of the class struggle revealed in those events and calls upon the workers to "enlighten the backward . . . still unenlightened toilers" and to consolidate "the organisation of the workers from the ground up" without which it would be impossible either to eliminate the dual power and to establish the undivided power of the Soviets or to achieve a solution for the war which would be acceptable to the proletariat.

PAGE 133.* The article "The 'Crisis of Power'" appeared in Pravda on May 15 (2), 1917, and was written by Lenin in that phase of the crisis of dual power which began with the events of May 3-4 (April 20-21). The confidence of the masses in the Provisional Government had been thoroughly undermined by these events. The bourgeois government could continue to hold on only by again deceiving the masses, concealing the power of the bourgeoisie by permitting representation in the government of the petty-bourgeois "Socialist" parties (the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks), who at that time controlled the Soviets and in whom the masses had not yet lost confidence. Accordingly, both within these parties and within bourgeois circles the idea of a "coalition government" arose, which, while including "Socialist" ministers, would essentially leave the power in the hands of the bourgeoisie. This idea gained ground on both sides, particularly when, influenced by the mistrust of the masses, first Guchkov, the Minister for War, and then Milyukov, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, resigned from the Provisional Government. Agitation was started for a coalition government, and under the influence of this agitation a number of military units and several provincial Soviets declared themselves in favour of a coalition government. The bourgeois circles began to exercise pressure in order to obtain a coalition government. For instance, on May 9 (April 26) the Moscow City Duma passed a resolution advocating the necessity for a coalition cabinet. The Provisional Government issued a manifesto to the citizens of Russia in which it stated:

"The Provisional Government gave a formal undertaking to act in contact with the Executive Committee, the Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies. Responsible politicians must reckon with the existence of the Provisional Government and the Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies. These two bodies must fulfil the obligations they undertook towards the country."

At first a difference of opinion existed between the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks on the question of coalition. The Socialist-Revolutionaries favoured participation in the government, while the Mensheviks opposed it.

But this difference was very quickly settled, and on the night of May 14 (1), after meetings of the fractions, the Executive Committee decided in favour of coalition by a majority of forty-four to nineteen, with two abstentions. The petty-bourgeois leaders completely capitulated to the bourgeoisie and its imperialist policy.

It was at the moment of this capitulation that Lenin wrote his article "The 'Crisis of Power,'" in which, as against this capitulation, he proposes the only possible way for the proletariat, the way he had been pointing out from the very first days of the revolution, namely, the elimination of dual power and the transfer of the whole power to the Soviets.

PAGE 136.* On May 18 (5) the Plenum of the Petrograd Soviet, upon the motion of the Executive Committee of the Soviet, endorsed the composition of the coalition government and its programme. The Bolsheviks, who were opposed to the coalition, received one hundred votes in support of their resolution. Six ministers were appointed to the coalition government from the "Socialists" (Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries): I. G. Tseretelli (Menshevik)—Minister for Post and Telegraph; M. I. Skobelev (Menshevik)—Minister for Labour; A. F. Kerensky (Socialist-Revolutionary)—Minister for War; V. M. Chernov (Socialist-Revolutionary)—Minister for Agriculture; N. P. Pereverzev (Narodni-Socialist)—Minister for Justice, and A. V. Peshekhonov (Narodni-Socialist)—Minister for Food.

The coalition government approved by the Soviet was a coalition against the revolution. Its short-lived rule revealed the full infamy of the treachery of the Menshevik-Socialist-Revolutionary bloc: their betrayal of the interests of the masses, surrender of the conquests of the revolution and reinforcement of the bourgeois dictatorship.

In his articles "On the Eve" and "Class Collaboration with Capital or a Class War Against Capital?" Lenin scathingly criticises "the experiment of class collaboration with capital" made by the Socialist-Revolutionary-Menshevik bloc when they agreed to the creation of a coalition government.

PAGE 140.* The articles "Ruin Is Threatening" and "Inevitable Catastrophe—Unlimited Promises" appeared in Pravda on May 27, 29 and 30 (14, 16 and 17). They dealt with the acute economic crisis from which Russia was suffering and pointed the way by which the country could extricate itself from its catastrophic position.

The economic system of the country was rapidly disintegrating. Industry, agriculture and transport were on the verge of collapse; financial bankruptcy was imminent; the food shortage was becoming increasingly acute, there was a chronic lack of goods, and unemployment was assuming monstrous proportions.

The Menshevik and Socialist-Revolutionary members of the Provisional Government, instead of adopting revolutionary measures to combat the economic disorganisation, confined their efforts to drawing up plans, creating a series of lifeless bureaucratic institutions, establishing "intimate organisational contact," drawing up "the fundamental principles" of regulation, to the creation of commissions, conferences with the employers and talk regarding control over the capitalists on the part of the state when the state power itself was in the hands of the capitalists.

While the petty-bourgeois Socialists were engaged in such negotiations, the capitalists held fast to their profits, raking in vast fortunes. They unceremoniously violated the decrees of the government on the regulation of prices, on state monopolies, etc. In those localities where more or less feeble attempts were made to bridle them, the capitalists deliberately disorganised production, closed down factories, threw the workers on to the streets, fostered industrial anarchy, systematically plundered national property and engaged in counter-revolutionary sabotage.

Lenin too saw that the only way of escape, the only salvation from the impending economic disaster, was to establish control over the capitalists; but not control on the part of a state the power of which was in the hands of the capitalists. According to Lenin, real control over the capitalists could be achieved only after satisfactory replies had been found to the following four questions: "What is to be done 1) so as actually 'not to protect' the profits of the capitalists; 2) to tear the shroud from commercial secrets; 3) to secure the workers a majority in the controlling bodies; 4) to secure that the organisation (of control and guidance), which is an organisation 'on a national scale,' shall be directed by the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies, and not by the capitalists?" (Lenin, Collected Works, Vol. XX, "The Struggle of the Proletariat Against Economic Ruin.")

The whole question was to institute control by the toilers themselves, particularly the proletariat, in other words, to institute workers' control over the capitalists. No other control would be effective. And such control could be organised only by a state the power of which was in the hands not of the capitalists, but "of the proletarians and semi-proletarians," in other words, a republic of Soviets. This idea of the possibility of escaping economic disaster by instituting genuine control over production, distribution and credit (the banks) only after the transfer of power to the working class through the Soviets was developed by Lenin in a number of articles during the year 1917. It forms the basis of the present two articles. And, in its turn, this idea itself is but an application to the existing economic situation of the slogan of control over the production and distribution of goods on the part of the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies which had already been issued by Lenin in his Theses of April 17 (4). In his article "Can the Bolsheviks Retain State Power?" (pp. 250-96 in the present volume), written on the eve of the conquest of power by the proletariat, Lenin regards workers' control instituted by a proletarian government as the corner-stone of the economic programme of the proletarian revolution and one of the measures of transition to socialism, again in complete harmony with the April Theses.

PAGE 141.* In the article in question, printed, as Lenin indicated, in the Izvestiya (News) of the Petrograd Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies of May 24 (11), the author admits the economic situation to be extremely grave, but expresses the assurance that the Provisional Government would manage to cope with the evil. As a proof of the good intentions of the Provisional Government the author cites the promise given by the government to introduce state and public control over production and exchange. This promise had been made by the new coalition government in the declaration it issued upon its formation on May 19 (6), 1917. The third paragraph of this declaration states:

"The Provisional Government will unswervingly and resolutely combat the economic disorganisation of the country by establishing systematic state and public control over production, transport, and the exchange and distribution of products, and if necessary will resort to the organisation of production."

PAGE 145.* Lenin has in mind the elections to the Borough Dumas in Petrograd which took place in May 1917. Seventy-one party lists of candidates were put forward in the ten boroughs. Five political groups participated in the elections—Bolsheviks, Cadets, the Radical-Democratic Party ("a sort of disguised Cadets," as Lenin called it), a bloc of Narodniki and Mensheviks of various shades, and, finally, various non-partisan organisations.

Lenin gave a political estimate of the electoral campaign in his articles "Forgetting the Main Thing," "The Party of the Proletariat at the Elections to the Borough Dumas," and "Parties in the Elections to the Petrograd Borough Dumas" (Collected Works, Vol. XX).

PAGE 146.* Malicious sabotage on the part of the owners of the factories and mines of the Krivoy Rog and the Donets Basin was deliberately practised during the existence of the Provisional Government. An article entitled "The Conflict in the Donets Basin," which appeared in Novaya Zhizn (New Life) on May 29 (6), 1917, stated:

"According to the testimony of the members of the workers' delegation, the capitalists of the Donets Basin are at present carrying on a systematic Italian strike [sabotage.—Ed.] and are deliberately neglecting and disorganising production. Since the revolution, propping has been entirely discontinued in the coal mines; the coal hewers are obliged to work under the most frightful conditions, momentarily running the risk of being hurled. . . . Everywhere machinery is worn out to the last degree; there are factories that function only four hours a day, the remaining eight hours being spent on 'getting up steam.' Repairs are not being carried out anywhere. . . . In spite of the terrible dearth of metal and coal, the delegates succeeded in exposing vast stocks of metal, coal and coke, which have been lying idle for months and have not been transported to the places of consumption in spite of the fact that rolling stock is available."

It need hardly be said that the workers' demands for wage increases and an eight-hour day were ignored. This sabotage of the employers in the Donets Basin was carried on with the obvious connivance of the Provisional Government.

In his articles advocating workers' control, Lenin frequently refers to the situation in the industries of the Donets Basin and to the protracted conflict between the workers and the employers in that area (cf. Collected Works, Vol. XX, "A Capitalist Mockery of the People"), PAGE 150*. The First All-Russian Congress of Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies opened in Petrograd on June 16 (3), 1917, and lasted for about three weeks. It was attended by 1,090 delegates, 820 of whom had the right to vote. The Bolsheviks had only 105 delegates at the Congress. The great majority of the voting delegates (520) were Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries, who at the Congress formed a united front against the Bolsheviks. The Congress was wholly concerned with 1) supporting the coalition Provisional Government and its bourgeois home and foreign policy; 2) continuing the war and the offensives, and 3) combating Bolshevism, which at that time had already won the support of a majority of the Petrograd proletariat and large numbers of the Petrograd garrison. The Congress by a vast majority approved the Mensheviks' and Socialist-Revolutionaries' joining the coalition government as representatives of the Soviets. It approved their policy and the offensive at the front undertaken by the government with the support of the Mensheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionaries. It attacked the Bolsheviks and the Petrograd proletariat which supported them, and prohibited the demonstration that had been appointed by the Bolshevik Party for June 23 (10). The Petrograd proletariat and large numbers of the garrison reacted to this prohibition by transforming the demonstration which the Congress itself appointed for July 1 (June 18) into a demonstration against the bourgeoisie and its servitors, against the Provisional Government, against the war and the offensive, and in favour of the Bolshevik slogans (see note to p. 164.*). Although the Bolsheviks constituted a small minority at the Congress of Soviets, the transformation of the demonstration organised by the Congress into a Bolshevik demonstration proved that the Bolshevik Party was the only genuine leader of the revolutionary masses, who were now losing their habit of confiding in the bourgeois government and the petty-bourgeois parties.

The Bolshevik fraction at the Congress acted as a solid unit. The Bolshevik speakers, one after another, condemned the policy of the parties which controlled the Soviets and their leaders, and over the heads of the Congress majority explained to the masses Lenin's political platform as confirmed in the resolutions of the All-Russian Party Conference of May (April) 1917. The fraction at the Congress was directly led by Lenin. He himself made speeches at the Congress on two cardinal questions—on the attitude towards the Provisional Government and on the war. The first of these speeches (Collected Works, Vol. XX) was delivered on June 17 (4) during the discussion on the report by the Menshevik F. Dan on the subject of "The Provisional Government and Revolutionary Democracy." The Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries claimed to be the representatives of "revolutionary democracy" and made great play of this pretension. Lenin pointed out that a distinction must be made between revolutionary democrats and reformist democrats in a capitalist government, and that the Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries were such reformist democrats. They had transformed the Soviets from organs of revolutionary struggle and revolutionary power into organs supporting the bourgeoisie and defending the policy of the bourgeois government in the eyes of the masses and to the detriment of the masses. Lenin said:

"One thing or the other: either the usual kind of bourgeois government—in which case the Peasants', Workers', Soldiers' and other Soviets are unnecessary and will either be dispersed by the generals, the counter-revolutionary generals who control the army without paying the slightest heed to the oratory of Minister Kerensky, or will die an inglorious death. There is no other alternative for these institutions, which can neither retreat nor mark time, but must march forward if they are to exist." And this forward march of the Soviets, Lenin pointed out, must be towards the assumption of power. "The Soviets cannot continue to exist as they are existing now," Lenin said. "... Such institutions imply a transition to a republic which will set up a strong power, without a police and without a standing army, in deed and not merely in word, a power such as cannot yet exist in Western Europe, a power without which there can be no victory for the Russian revolution, no victory over the landlords and over imperialism."

The leaders of the Soviets at the Congress boasted that they did not place the power in the hands of the Soviets during the crisis of May 3-4 (April 20-21), when the power "fell into their hands like a ripe fruit," and went on to declare that they had no intention of pursuing any other policy. Lenin, on the contrary, at the Congress called upon the masses to have the Soviets assume power. The Menshevik Tseretelli declared that there was not a single party in Russia that would consent to assume the entire power, that would be prepared to say: "Give us the power." Whereupon Lenin called out: "I say there is! No party can refuse to do that, and our Party does not refuse it. It is prepared at any minute to take over the entire power." Lenin's words were greeted by applause from the Bolshevik fraction, and by ironical exclamations and laughter on the part of the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik majority of the Congress. But they laughed too soon: within two weeks the demonstration of July 1 (June 18) was to show that the Bolsheviks were already marching to power at the head of the revolutionary working class masses. Hurling at the Mensheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionaries the declaration that the Bolsheviks were prepared to assume the entire power, Lenin stated that the Bolshevik Party had already announced its programme of action—a programme of a genuine revolutionary power under the conditions of the present revolution. "This programme has been given by our Conference of May 12 (April 29)," he said, referring to the resolutions of the All-Russian Party Conference of May (April) 1917, and proceeded in the remainder of his speech to give, as he expressed it, "Citizen the Minister for Post and Telegraph" (i.e., Tseretelli) a "popular explanation" of this programme.

In the speech on the war, delivered on June 22 (9), which is reproduced here, Lenin continues to develop this programme in relation to the war. The full weight of his arguments was hurled against the imperialist policy of the Provisional Government and against the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik leaders of the Soviets, who were conducting "the foreign policy of the Russian revolution in complete accord with the capitalists." Of all the verbal and printed utterances of Lenin in 1917, this speech throws the most light upon his attitude towards the war at that period.

PAGE 150. This manifesto of the Petrograd Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, entitled "To All the Peoples of the World" and dated March 28 (15), 1917, which Lenin analyses in the present speech, was a Menshevik-Socialist-Revolutionary manifesto and expressed, as Lenin points out, a revolutionary-defencist position advocating defence of the interests of one's "own," i.e., the Russian, capitalists and bankers. The manifesto stated:

"... We appeal to the peoples which are being exterminated and impoverished by this monstrous war and declare that the time has come to begin a resolute struggle against the predatory aspirations of the governments of all countries; the time has come for the peoples to take the question of war and peace into their own hands. Recognising their revolutionary power, the Russian democracy declare that they will exert every effort to resist the annexationist policy of their own ruling classes, and call upon the peoples of Europe to join in resolute action on behalf of peace.... We appeal to our brother proletarians of the Austro-German Alliance, and particularly to the German proletariat. From the very outbreak of the war you have been assured that in taking up arms against the Russian autocracy you were defending European culture against Asiatic despotism. In that many of you saw a justification for supporting the war. This justification no longer exists: a democratic Russia can be no menace to freedom and civilisation.... We will resolutely defend our own freedom against all reactionary attacks, both from within and from without. The Russian revolution will not retire before the bayonets of conquerors and will not allow itself to be crushed by force of foreign arms. But we appeal to you: Throw off the yoke of your semi-autocratic system just as the Russian people have shaken off the tsarist autocracy. Refuse to serve as the instruments of depredation and violence of kings, landlords and bankers—and by solid unity of effort we shall put an end to this frightful shambles, which disgraces humanity and casts a gloom over the glorious days of the birth of Russian freedom...."

PAGE 155.* The resolution of the All-Russian Party Conference of May (April) 1917 on the war spoke of the question of a separate peace in the following terms:

"This war cannot be ended by the refusal of the soldiers on one side only to continue the war, or by the simple cessation of military operations by one of the warring parties. The Conference emphatically protests against the vile slander spread by the capitalists against our Party, to the effect that we favour a separate peace with Germany. We regard the German capitalists as the same sort of bandits as the Russian, British, French and other capitalists, and the Emperor Wilhelm as the same kind of crowned bandit as Nicholas II and the British, Italian, Rumanian and other monarchs. Our Party will patiently but insistently explain to the people the truth that . . . this war can be ended . . . only if the whole power of government, at least in several of the belligerent countries, passes into the hands of the class of proletarians and semi-proletarians, which is truly able to put an end to the yoke of capital." (Collected Works, Vol. XX.)

Thus when Lenin and the Party in 1917 opposed a separate peace, they associated the cessation of war on the part of Russia and the possibility or impossibility of a separate peace, not with any obligations which Russia may have assumed towards her "allies" (i.e., the British, French and other bourgeoisies), but with the fate of the proletarian revolution in the warring countries and with their policy directed towards revolution. When the proletarian revolution was accomplished in Russia, but was delayed in Western Europe, the interests of both the Russian and the international proletariat demanded that the working class of Russia should retain possession of the power it had conquered. This entailed the immediate cessation of the war with Germany, even on the most unfavourable terms. Accordingly, Lenin and the Party consented to the conclusion of a separate peace with German imperialism (cf. Lenin, Selected Works, Vol. VII, "Report on War and Peace at the Seventh Party Congress" and the article " 'Left-Wing' Childishness and Petty-Bourgeois Mentality").

PAGE 155. The Menshevik and Socialist-Revolutionary leaders and theoreticians regarded as annexations only territory which had been seized during the imperialist World War, and their solution for the war was therefore a false one. They advocated a peace without annexations made in the course of that war, which meant restoring the forcible retention of enslaved peoples under the rule of dominating states as it had existed prior to the war. This was to be understood as meaning that if, for instance, Germany during the war had deprived Russia of Courland, the latter was to be returned to Russia; that Great Britain was to return to Germany the African colonies which belonged to Germany before the war, etc., etc. The fact that Courland at one time, long before the war, had been violently seized by Russia, and that Germany had annexed the African colonies against the will of the inhabitants of those colonies, was not considered by the compromisers and was not regarded by them as coming under the head of annexations.

Hence, the solution proposed by the Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries was that the old, pre-war seizures were to remain unaltered, but there were to be no new ones. "Such a solution," Lenin said, "firstly, cannot be justified by a Socialist without his betraying socialism. It is not the business of a Socialist to endeavour to reconcile the capitalists over the old division of spoils, i.e., annexations. . . . Secondly, such a solution is unrealisable anyhow without a revolution against capital." (Collected Works, Vol. XX, "A Deal With the Capitalists, or the Overthrow of the Capitalists?")

PAGE 158.* Kiaochow (a Chinese seaport and the adjacent territory) was seized by Japan from Germany during the imperialist war. Japan promised to return it to its lawful owner, China, but the promise was never fulfilled.

The Islands of the Pacific, the Carolines, Marianas, and others, formerly belonging to Germany, were also seized by Japan during the war.

PAGE 158. The policy of the Provisional Government towards Finland and the Ukraine, a policy wholeheartedly supported by the "Socialist" ministers, continued to be that of a dominant power; it was a nationalist policy, in no wise differing from that of the tsarist government. If there was any difference, it consisted in the fact that the bourgeoisie exercised the policy of annexations and oppression of the smaller nationalities more subtly and covertly, promising an agreement between the future Constituent Assembly, on the one hand, and the Finnish Diet and the Ukrainian Rada, on the other, but definitely opposing the right of the Ukraine and Finland to secede immediately from the Russian state. Lenin, in exposing this policy, frequently asked why, if the bourgeoisie were really opposed to annexations, they did not immediately recognise the right of Finland and the Ukraine to secession. Only when that right had been granted could Finland and the Ukraine arrive at a really voluntary agreement with Russia. "In order that the agreement might be a true agreement, and not a verbal screen for subjugation, it is necessary that both sides enjoy equal rights, i.e., that both Russia and Finland should have the right not to agree." (Collected Works, Vol. XX, "Finland and Russia.")

When he speaks of the fault-finding of the Provisional Government in relation to the Ukrainian Congress, Lenin is referring to the following incident. Kerensky, in his capacity of Minister for War, and allegedly on the grounds of military considerations, sent a telegram in which he declared that the convocation of a Second Ukrainian Army Congress was untimely. The Ukrainian Peasant Congress characterised this as a violation of the right of assembly in respect to the Ukrainians and sent a telegram of protest to the Provisional Government and the Petrograd Soviet. For more details, cf. Lenin, Collected Works, Vol. XX, the articles "Finland and Russia," "That Is Not Democratic, Citizen Kerensky!" "The Ukraine" and "The Ukraine and the Defeat of the Ruling Parties in Russia."

PAGE 161.* The first Russian Revolution of 1905-07 served to stimulate the revolutionary movement in a number of Oriental countries. In 1908 a revolution took place in Turkey under the leadership of the Young Turks (the party of the Turkish bourgeoisie), resulting in the establishment of a constitutional monarchy. In Persia in 1906 the revolutionary movement compelled Shah Mehmed Ali to inaugurate the Medjlis, or parliament, which was, however, abolished in 1908 as a result of a counter-revolution effected with the aid of Russian Cossacks. China witnessed a rise of the revolutionary movement in 1907, led by the party of Sun Yat-sen. A revolution broke out in 1911 leading to the proclamation of a republic in Southern China, and later in Northern China. On the subject of the revolutions in the East, cf. Lenin, Selected Works, Vol. IV, "Inflammable Material in World Politics," "Democracy and Narodism in China" and "Regenerated China."

PAGE 163.* Lenin is referring to the letter of a peasant, G. Andreyev, in which he writes:

"I am a muzhik, a peasant. In the summer I live in the village; before coming to work in the factory I lived in the village and now visit it two or three times a year. . . . I was a Socialist-Revolutionary since 1905, but when they began to say that we should not take the land from the gentry, my ideas began to turn away from them; and when they agreed to the Liberty Loan I deserted them and joined the Party of the Bolsheviks; but not the Mensheviks, because, although I do not understand much, I do know what I need. . . . I should like to say a few words on what I think of the various parties in the countryside. . . . I understand the village assembly in this way: a peasant like myself. The Zemsky Nachalnik [the government prefect in the country districts under the tsarist regime.—Ed.] I compare with the Cadets, who defend capital and the bourgeoisie. . . . The volost elder I compare to the learned professors, who want it to be good for some, and not bad for the others, but will put off the matter for a thousand years and meanwhile let everybody keep calm. The village elder I compare with the Mensheviks. . . . Muzhik-fatguts (the rich fellows) I compare with the Socialist-Revolutionaries. . . . Take the poor muzhik. Him I compare to the Bolshevik Social-Democrats. They do not regard the war in the same way as the village elder and muzhik-fatguts: since the people do not need the war, the people must stop it; but not anyhow, and must not put their heads out for the bullets to hit. Fraternise at the front, but do not doze in the rear; work with all your might for the sacred truth. We must not stand idle and wait until somebody drops from heaven and puts an end to the war. We must press harder on the bourgeoisie until it bursts at every seam, and then the war will end. But if we do not press hard enough on the bourgeoisie, it will be bad. . . ."

PAGE 164.* The article "The Eighteenth of June," published in Pravda on the day following the demonstration of July 1 (June 18), 1917 (see note to p. 150 *), deals with the significance the demonstration had for the course of the revolution and its growth into a proletarian revolution. The growth into a proletarian revolution depended on how soon the patient explanatory work of the Bolshevik Party would succeed in undermining the confidence of the working class masses and the village poor in the bourgeois government and the petty-bourgeois parties. Since May 3-4 (April 20-21), when the poorly organised and numerically comparatively insignificant masses in Petrograd dealt the first blow at the Provisional Government, the masses had grown more and more restless and rallied in increasing numbers around the Bolshevik revolutionary slogans. The fact that the Mensheviks and the Socialist-

Revolutionaries had joined the Provisional Government did not restore confidence in the latter, and in fact only served to destroy the last remnants of the confidence of the masses in the Mensheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionaries themselves. The very first measures taken by the coalition government made it clear to the masses that the "Socialist" ministers and their parties were out to serve the bourgeoisie and were only being used by the latter and the capitalist ministers in order to fool the masses. The presence of the "Socialist" ministers in the coalition government only served to convince the workers and soldiers that the petty-bourgeois parties were incapable of doing anything to satisfy their most urgent demands: bread, land, peace and control over production and distribution. In all the large industrial centres, and particularly in Petrograd, factory after factory and regiment after regiment, led by the Bolshevik Party, deserted the petty-bourgeois parties. Meanwhile, the coalition government, counting upon the influence of its "Socialist" agents within the Soviets, made up its mind to do what the first Provisional Government had not dared to do: through the agency of the Socialist ministers it organised an offensive at the front and a simultaneous attack upon the workers and soldiers who were going over to the Bolsheviks. Before proceeding to undertake the offensive at the front, it issued a "Declaration of Rights of the Soldiers," which in the revolutionary press was nicknamed a "Declaration of Wrongs," for it was in fact a step towards depriving the soldiers of the rights and liberties they had won. A trial sortie was made against the working class masses: under the pretext that the mansion of the former tsarist minister Durnovo, which had been seized by the workers' organisations of the Viborg district in Petrograd, was serving as an asylum for anarchists, the government, followed by the Petrograd Soviet, demanded its evacuation. The question was also raised of evicting the Petrograd and the Central Committees of the Bolshevik Party from the mansion they occupied, belonging to a former mistress of the tsar, Kshesinskaya. The first trial arrest of Bolshevik agitators was undertaken. This was pouring fat on the fire. The workers and soldiers of Petrograd were in a state of ferment. The Bolshevik slogan "All power to the Soviets" became the popular slogan of the workers and soldiers in Petrograd. A situation arose in which it became necessary and essential to take stock of the revolutionary forces supporting the Bolshevik Party in this political centre of the country, to organise them and to lead them in a demonstration, so as to give a spur to the further accumulation and mobilisation of revolutionary forces throughout the country. The Central Committee and the Petrograd Committee decided that this demonstration of revolutionary strength in Petrograd should be held on June 23 (10), during the Congress of Soviets, as a contrast to the betrayal of the revolution which every session of the Congress represented. The leaders of the Congress learned of the demonstration on June 22 (9) and, in pursuance of their policy of protecting the interests of the bourgeoisie and the bourgeois government, used this pretext in order to proceed from the first timid measures taken against the revolutionary proletariat and its Bolshevik vanguard to a regular declaration of war. Accusing the Bolsheviks of playing the game of the "dark forces" and of opening the gates to counter-revolution, and under cover of talk about defending the revolution against anarchy which was leading to counter-revolution, the Mensheviks Gegechkori and Tseretelli at the Congress brought a motion, in the name of the presidium of the Congress, to prohibit all demonstrations for a period of three days. The motion was adopted by the Congress. The Central Committee of the Bolshevik Party decided to submit to this decision, and not only cancelled the demonstration, but also took measures to hold back the working masses who were straining to come out on to the streets. Nevertheless, on June 24 (11) a joint meeting of the presidium of the Congress and the bureaus of all the fractions of the Congress and the Executive Committees of the Petrograd Soviet and the All-Russian Peasants' Union was held for the purpose of declaring war on the Bolsheviks. The cancelled peaceful demonstration was at this meeting declared to be a "conspiracy" for the overthrow of the Provisional Government. The Menshevik Dan demanded "a law against the Bolsheviks," while Tseretelli proposed that the Bolsheviks and the Petrograd proletariat be disarmed. The Bolsheviks withdrew from this counter-revolutionary meeting. Thanks to the opposition of Martov's group and of the delegates from the provincial Soviets, whose sentiments were less counter-revolutionary than those of the Menshevik leaders, Dan and Tseretelli did not entirely succeed in carrying their proposals. Nevertheless, a resolution condemning the Bolsheviks was adopted by this session and on June 25 (12) was confirmed by the Congress. The Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik majority of the Congress followed the bourgeoisie and its agents, the Socialist ministers, in their attack upon the growing proletarian revolution, against which war was declared. Furthermore, the majority of the Congress, still relying upon its authority and influence among the workers and soldiers, followed up this declaration of war on the proletarian revolution by appointing a demonstration in the name of the Congress for July 1 (June 18) in place of the Bolshevik demonstration that had been prohibited. The majority of the Congress flattered themselves that this demonstration would bear an anti-Bolshevik character. But it turned out otherwise. The workers and soldiers of Petrograd showed that the Menshevik-Socialist-Revolutionary Congress did not reflect their frame of mind and that they trusted only the Bolsheviks.

The nature of the demonstration of July 1 (June 18) was a complete surprise for the Congress and a triumph for the Bolsheviks. About 400,000 workers and soldiers took part in the demonstration. The overwhelming majority of the banners and inscriptions bore the slogans issued by the Bolshevik Central Committee: "Down with the ten capitalist ministers" and "All power to the Soviets." The slogan "Confidence in the Provisional Government" advanced by the Menshevik and Socialist-Revolutionary Congress of Soviets was inscribed on only three banners, belonging respectively to a Cossack regiment, the Yedinstvo group, and the Petrograd organisation of the Bund. Even the Izvestiya of the Petrograd Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, the editorial board of which consisted of Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries, was obliged to report the fact that the demonstrators in their anger tore up the few banners which bore this slogan.

Demonstrations similar to that held in Petrograd were held, partly that day and partly on July 8 (June 25), in Moscow, Kiev, Kharkov, Ekaterinoslav, Ivanovo-Voznesensk, Sormovo, Nizhni-Novgorod and in a number of other towns.

On the same day, July 1 (June 18), Kerensky, who had made a tour of the front and exercised his persuasive powers on the soldiers at hundreds of meetings, succeeded in getting the armies to undertake an offensive on the Western and South-Western fronts. For a day or two the offensive was successful and resulted in the capture of several thousand Austrian prisoners. But as a result of inadequate technical preparations, poor generalship, and the fact that the heart of the soldiers was not in it, the offensive was very soon transformed into a severe rout for the Russian armies. The latter were obliged not only to surrender all the territory they had seized, but to retire a long way behind their original positions, and in the course of the operation suffered great losses in killed, wounded and captured.

From that moment on the influence of the Bolsheviks, who had already won the leadership in the Petrograd factories and the regiments quartered in Petrograd, began to spread rapidly on the military fronts.

In his article "The Eighteenth of June" Lenin describes this day as "a day of crisis," which showed that the way out of the impasse lay in the seizure of power by the proletariat.

PAGE 167.* The article "On Slogans," published in pamphlet form by the Kronstadt Committee of the R.S.D.L.P., and the associated article, "Constitutional Illusions," which appeared in the Bolshevik paper, Rabochy i Soldat (Worker and Soldier), on August 17-18 (4-5), 1917, were written by Lenin in connection with the events which took place in Petrograd on July 16-17 (3-4) and the direct counter-revolutionary attack of the bourgeoisie and its petty-bourgeois agents in the government and in the Soviets upon the proletariat and its party which followed these events.

The facts of the July events were as follows: on July 15 (2) the Cadet members of the Provisional Government announced their resignation from the government. The pretext they gave was their difference with Kerensky and the other Socialist ministers over the Ukrainian question. The Cadets were opposed to granting the Ukraine even the semblance of autonomy and demanded the postponement of the Ukrainian question until the Constituent Assembly should meet. But this was only a pretext. The withdrawal of the Cadet Party from the government was merely a manoeuvre, the purpose of which was 1) to throw upon the shoulders of the Mensheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionaries the whole burden of responsibility for the failure of the offensive at the front and 2) that these parties, remaining in the government alone without the support of the bourgeoisie, and with each passing day forfeiting the confidence of the workers and soldiers (and hence of the peasants), should again of their own accord appeal to the Cadets and be prepared to consent to any conditions that might be presented by the bourgeoisie. In the resignation of the Cadets from the government the workers and soldiers saw a favourable opportunity for bringing pressure to bear upon the Soviets, still controlled by the Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries, to take over the power of government. This was the purpose of the spontaneous armed demonstration which took place on July 16 (3). One of the first to take action was a machine-gun regiment, delegates from which appeared at the Petrograd Party Conference, then in session in the Kshesinskaya mansion, the headquarters of the Central Committee and the Petrograd Committee of the Bolsheviks, and announced that the regiment had sent out delegates to all military units with a call to action. They appealed for the support of the Bolsheviks. The Conference advised them to refrain from action on the grounds that it was premature. That evening two regiments approached the Kshesinskaya mansion bearing banners with the slogan "All Power to the Soviets." A little later workers' demonstrations also appeared with slogans similarly directed against the coalition government. Considering the mood of the masses, the Central Committee, which assembled that evening, issued a call for a peaceful demonstration. The Workers' Section of the Petrograd Soviet expressed themselves by a two-thirds majority in favour of the demonstration, and elected a provisional committee of fifteen members to take charge of the movement. On July 17 (4) more than half a million workers and soldiers took part in the movement. The demonstration proceeded to the Taurida Palace, where the All-Russian Central Executive Committee of the Soviets had its quarters. Sailors arrived from Kronstadt. The Peter and Paul fortress sided with the demonstrators. Exemplary order prevailed in the city. No institutions were seized, nor generally were there any acts of violence on the part of the masses. Nevertheless, at the corner of the Nevsky Prospect and Sadovaya Street fire was opened on the demonstrators. The demonstrators returned the shots. The Central Executive Committee of the Soviets, which was in the hands of the Mensheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionaries, when called upon by the masses to take over the power of government, refused. The movement found itself at an impasse. Some of the soldiers returned to their barracks, others remained on the streets. On July 18 (5) documents appeared in a small yellow journal, Zhivoye Slovo (Living Word), signed by a former member of the Second State Duma and member of Plekhanov's Yedinstvo group, Alexinsky, an unscrupulous scandalmonger, and by a former Schlüsselburg prisoner, Pankratov. These documents had been fabricated by the Intelligence Service with the knowledge and consent of the Socialist-Revolutionary-Menshevik government with the purpose of demoralising the masses. They alleged that Lenin was a German spy and under instructions of the German General Staff was endeavouring to undermine the confidence of the Russian people in the Provisional Government. That evening the counter-revolutionary troops summoned by Kerensky from the front and the Junkers from the environs of Petrograd occupied the city, closed the bridges to traffic and proceeded to effect raids, searches and arrests. The movement was suppressed. On July 18 (5) a gang of Junkers wrecked the editorial offices of Pravda and on the next day the Bolshevik printing establishment, which had been purchased with money contributed by the workers, was also wrecked. On July 19 (6) the Kshesinskaya mansion was raided and an order issued for the arrest of Lenin, Lunacharsky, Kollontai and a number of other Bolsheviks. An unbridled campaign was launched against the Bolsheviks: they were accused of armed insurrection, mutiny, and so forth. On July 20 (7) the Provisional Government resolved to disarm and disband the army units which had taken part in the "mutiny" of July 16-18 (3-5). At the same time, it systematically proceeded to disarm the workers in the mills and factories, and to arrest everyone suspected of Bolshevism. The death penalty was restored at the front. All these measures were effected by the Socialist-Revolutionary-Menshevik government in full agreement with the All-Russian Central Executive Committee of the Soviets.

The resignation of the Cadets was followed by that of the Chairman of the Provisional Government, Lvov, and the government was now headed by Kerensky. The All-Russian Central Executive Committee of the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, together with the Executive Committee of the All-Russian Soviet of Peasants' Deputies, hailed this government as "a government for the salvation of the revolution." That government, which consisted for a certain time solely of representatives from the petty-bourgeois parties (the Mensheviks, Socialist-Revolutionaries and Narodni-Socialists), scrupulously performed its duty as the counter-revolutionary dictatorship of the bourgeoisie. The bourgeoisie, however, persisted in the execution of its plan. On July 25 (12), lack of confidence was expressed in this government of salvation by the Provisional Committee of the State Duma, a body which was still in existence. This example was followed by a number of other bourgeois counter-revolutionary organisations. The government resigned, and the Menshevik and Socialist-Revolutionary leaders started negotiations with the Cadets, and with commercial and industrial circles direct, for the formation of a new coalition government. The Cadets put forward the condition that the government and its ministers should be entirely independent of the Soviets. The Mensheviks agreed. This new government of bourgeois counter-revolution, which was entirely independent of the Soviets and entirely dependent upon the bourgeoisie, was formed on August 6 (July 24) under the chairmanship of Kerensky, and consisted of Socialist-Revolutionaries, Mensheviks, Cadets and representatives of the bourgeoisie. It continued the policy of the "salvation" of the revolution.

The July events marked a turning point in the course of the revolution in the period from February to October. They signified that all possibilities for a peaceful development of the revolution had been exhausted. The July demonstration of the workers and soldiers, Lenin said, was the last attempt to induce the Soviets by means of a demonstration to take over power. The response of the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik leaders in the Soviets and the Provisional Government and of the counter-revolutionary bourgeoisie to that attempt was to fire upon the demonstrators—and then surrender the power to the military clique. On July 23 (10), five days after the July demonstrations, Lenin, in an article entitled "The Political Situation," which at that time remained unpublished, declared that "the counter-revolution organised and consolidated itself, and in fact took over the power of government." "In point of fact, the principal state power in Russia is now a military dictatorship," he wrote. And that meant that there was no longer a dual power of the bourgeoisie and the Soviets; the bourgeoisie had established its counter-revolutionary dictatorship and had begun an armed attack upon the proletariat. In view of the growing influence of the proletarian party among the workers and the soldiers (and hence among the peasants) and of the fact that it was plotting its course for a proletarian dictatorship, the only possible deduction the Party could draw from this situation was that it must prepare for a new revolution. On the other hand, "the leaders of the Soviets and the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik parties, led by Tseretelli and Chernov, had," as Lenin points out in his article, "finally betrayed the cause of revolution to the counter-revolutionaries and allowed themselves, their parties and the Soviets to become a fig-leaf for counter-revolution." In so doing, the Soviets ceased to be a force based upon the masses of armed workers and soldiers. The party of the proletariat could not possibly favour the transfer of power to such Soviets; and until the latter became revolutionary Soviets, led by the proletarian party, the slogan "All power to the Soviets" could no longer serve as a slogan for the transition from the bourgeois revolution to the proletarian revolution. Owing to this fact, and also to the fact that "the actual power had passed into the hands of a military dictatorship," Lenin in this article stated that "this slogan is no longer true, for it does not reckon with this transfer of power and with the practical fact that the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks have completely betrayed the revolution."

"During the first stage this slogan signified the rupture of the bloc of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks with the Cadets, the formation of a Soviet government consisting of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks (for at that time the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks predominated in the Soviets), the right of free agitation for the opposition (that is, for the Bolsheviks) and the free struggle of parties within the Soviets, the assumption being that by means of such a struggle the Bolsheviks would succeed in capturing the Soviets and changing the composition of the Soviet government in the course of the peaceful development of the revolution. Of course this plan did not signify the dictatorship of the proletariat. But it undoubtedly facilitated the preparation of the conditions required for guaranteeing the dictatorship, for by putting the Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries into power and forcing them to carry into effect their anti-revolutionary platform it hastened the un-masking of the true nature of these parties, hastened their isolation, their rupture with the masses. However, the July defeat of the Bolsheviks cut short this development, gave the upper hand to the counter-revolution of the Cadets and the militarists and threw the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks into the arms of the latter. This circumstance forced the Party temporarily to withdraw its slogan 'All power to the Soviets,' in order to advance it again when a fresh revolutionary upsurge occurred." (Stalin, Leninism, Vol. I, "The October Revolution and the Tactics of the Russian Communists.")

"The objective situation" which arose after the July days raised the following alternative: "Either the complete victory of the military dictatorship, or the victory of the decisive struggle of the workers." In all the articles he wrote after the July days, Lenin called upon the Party and the working class, and the poor peasants, to proceed to this decisive struggle and to this new revolution. The present article ("On Slogans") and the succeeding article ("Constitutional Illusions") are devoted to justifying the replacement of the tactics and slogans of a peaceful development of the revolution by the tactics and slogans of a new and violent revolution.

These articles served as the basis for the decisions of the Sixth Congress of the Bolshevik Party, which was held in Petrograd on August 8-16 (July 26-August 3), 1917, and which indicated the tactical plan of the preparations for armed insurrection and the armed seizure of power by the revolutionary proletariat. The subsequent course of events and the October Revolution entirely corroborated the ideas expressed by Lenin in these articles.

PAGE 169.* General Cavaignac was Minister for War in the Provisional Government of the French Republic after the February Revolution of 1848. During the uprising of the Paris workers in June 1848 he acquired dictatorial powers and the uprising was brutally suppressed. Lenin uses the epithet "the Cavaignacs, the military ruffians," of the counter-revolutionary military clique headed by Generals Kornilov, Kaledin and Alexeyev, which, under the shield and with the aid of Kerensky and the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks, wreaked retribution on the workers and soldiers on July 16-18 (3-5), virtually took the power of government into its own hands, and set about preparing for a counter-revolution with the object of restoring the monarchy.

PAGE 171.* These words are taken from Engels' Origin of the Family, Private Property and the State, which first appeared in 1884. Regarding the state and "special detachments of armed men," cf. Lenin, Selected Works, Vol. VII, "The State and Revolution," Chap. I, Sections 1 and 2.

PAGE 172.* Regarding these "errors," cf. "Lessons of the Crisis," and "The 'Crisis of Power,'" pp. 129-32 and 133-35 in this volume.

PAGE 176.* The First State Duma was convened by the tsarist government in the spring of 1906, following the armed uprising in Moscow in 1905, and was prorogued by the government in the summer of the same year (cf. Lenin, Selected Works, Vol. III, "The Dissolution of the Duma and the Tasks of the Proletariat").

PAGE 178.* An item in Pravda on July 10 (June 27), 1917, entitled "The Bolsheviks Are To Blame," quoted a statement from the paper Vlast Naroda (People's Power), which ran:

"It is reported that the Provisional Government hastened to announce its decision regarding the date of convocation of the Constituent Assembly owing to the fact that the Bolsheviks were planning to accuse the Provisional Government publicly of deliberately postponing the convocation of the Constituent Assembly."

PAGE 178. The item in question, entitled "The Postponement of the Convocation of the Constituent Assembly," stated:

"It is reported that in the course of the negotiations which took place between the Provisional Government and the candidates for ministerial posts in the new coalition government the question was raised of the date of convocation of the Constituent Assembly. The candidates from the People's Freedom Party were of the emphatic opinion that the Constituent Assembly could not be convoked by October 13 (September 30). The members of the Provisional Government, including Tseretelli, declared that the Provisional Government had been obliged to fix the date of convocation of the Constituent Assembly for October 13 (September 30), but if in the immediate future it became apparent that a proper convocation could not be guaranteed by the appointed date, the Constituent Assembly would be postponed. It is proposed to postpone the convocation of the Constituent Assembly for two months and to appoint it for December 2 (November 19)."

Volya Naroda (Will of the People), the paper from which this quotation was taken, was published in Petrograd in 1917 by the extreme Right Wing of the Socialist-Revolutionary Party.

For Russkaya Volya, see note to p. 25.*

PAGE 179.* Lenin is referring to the German National Assembly, convoked during the German Revolution of 1848-49 to draw up a German national constitution. The Assembly met in Frankfort-on-Main. It consisted chiefly of professors, writers and similar representatives of the bourgeois intelligentsia. Instead of acting, the "Frankfort talkshop" wasted its time in fruitless discussion. The deputies "uttered fine words, adopted all sorts of democratic 'decisions,' 'constituted' all kinds of liberties, while in reality they left power in the hands of the king and failed to organise an armed struggle against the armed forces at the disposal of the king." And while they "were prattling, the king bided his time, consolidated his military forces, and the counter-revolution, relying on real force, utterly routed the democrats with all their beautiful 'decisions.' " (Lenin, Selected Works, Vol. III, "The Two Tactics of Social-Democracy in the Democratic Revolution.")

PAGE 179. Rabochaya Gazeta, the central organ of the Mensheviks, in an editorial in its issue of August 3 (July 21), 1917, entitled "The Dissolution of the Diet," referred to the Russian Constituent Assembly as a "Russian Convention."

The National Convention (September 20, 1792-October 24, 1795) was the third National Assembly to be held in France in the period of the Great French Revolution, and the first to be elected on the basis of universal suffrage. The Convention proclaimed France a republic. It tried the king and condemned him to death, and organised the defence of France against external and internal enemies of the revolution. When the true revolutionary democrats—the Jacobins headed by Robespierre—came to power in 1793, they expelled the moderate bourgeois republicans, the Girondists, from the Convention and condemned many of them to the guillotine. The Convention thereupon proceeded to draw up a new and more democratic constitution. It completely abolished the feudal system. It established fixed prices for bread and other articles of prime necessity. It instituted a Red Terror and crushed the counter-revolutionary revolts within the country. Together with its organs, the Committee of Public Safety and the Committee of General Security, the Convention formed the bulwark of the revolutionary government, which was strictly centralised and controlled by the Jacobin Party, the representative of the interests of the petty bourgeoisie. After the fall of Robespierre, and with him of the dictatorship of the petty bourgeoisie, the National Convention became a bulwark of bourgeois reaction. It drew up a new constitution and, in October 1795, transferred the power of government to the bourgeois Directory (a council of five persons endowed with considerable powers and designed to combat revolution).

PAGE 180.* The "Social-Democrats" of 1848—Lenin is referring to the French petty-bourgeois democratic party headed by Ledru-Rollin, who, like the Jacobins in 1793, also called themselves montagnards (the Mountain). They formed the Left opposition in the Constituent Assembly of 1848, in which the majority consisted of monarchists. This party had the support of the petty bourgeoisie of the towns, a part of the peasantry, and certain sections of the proletariat. Marx gives a class analysis of this party and its actions in The Eighteenth Brumaire, where he says:

"No party exaggerates its powers more than the democrats, none deludes itself more irresponsibly over the situation. . . . The democrat, because he represents the petty bourgeoisie, that is a transition class, in which the interests of two classes are simultaneously deadened, imagines himself elevated above class antagonism generally. The democrats concede that a privileged class confronts them, but they, along with all the rest of the surrounding nation, form the people. What they represent are the people's rights; what interests them are the people's interests. Accordingly, when a struggle is impending, they do not need to examine the interests and positions of the different classes. They do not need to consider their own resources too critically. They have merely to give the signal, and the people, with all its inexhaustible resources, will fall upon the oppressors. If in the performance their interests now prove to be uninteresting and their power to be impotence, then either the fault lies with pernicious sophists, who split the indivisible people into different hostile camps, or the army was too brutalised and blinded to apprehend the pure aims of democracy as best for itself, or the whole thing has been wrecked by a detail in its execution, or else an unforeseen accident has for this time spoilt the game. In any case, the democrat comes out of the most disgraceful defeat just as immaculate as he went into it innocent, with the newly-won conviction that he is bound to conquer, not that he himself and his party have to give up the old standpoint, but, on the contrary, that conditions have to ripen in his direction."

PAGE 182.* This expression is taken from a passage by Marx in which he describes the character of the majority of the French peasantry in the middle of the nineteenth century who had supported the monarchist coup d'état of Napoleon III after the Revolution of 1848:

"The Bonaparte dynasty represents not the revolutionary, but the conservative peasant; not the peasant that strikes out beyond the condition of his social existence, the small holding, but rather the peasant who wants to consolidate it; not the country folk who want to overthrow the old order through their own energies linked up with the towns, but on the contrary those who, in stupefied bondage to this old order, want to see themselves with their small holding saved and favoured by the ghost of the Empire. It represents not the enlightenment, but the superstition of the peasant; not his judgment, but his prejudice; not his future, but his past." (The Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte.)

PAGE 183.* The Peasant Revolt, or the Peasant War, in Germany in the sixteenth century was provoked by feudal oppression and extortion. The chief demand of the peasants was the abolition of serfdom, with its feudal obligations and the privileges of the lord of the manor. Engels describes these wars in The Peasant War in Germany.

Engels speaks of the "lessons of experience" common to the peasant revolts of the sixteenth century and to the Revolution of 1848 in Germany, as follows:

"...Local and provincial decentralisation and the resultant local and provincial narrow-mindedness ruined the whole movement. . . . Neither middle class nor peasantry nor plebeians could unite for concerted national action. . . . The peasants of every province acted only for themselves, as a rule refusing aid to the insurgent peasants of the neighbouring region, and therefore being annihilated in individual battles one after another by armies which in most cases counted hardly one-tenth of the total number of the insurgent masses. . . . The analogy with the movement of 1848-50 is here also apparent. In 1848, as in the Peasant War, the interests of the opposition classes clashed with each other and each acted of its own accord. . . . As to provincial narrow-mindedness, it could hardly have been greater in 1925 among the peasants than it was among the classes participating in the movement of 1848."

PAGE 188.* Lenin is referring to the State Conference summoned by the Provisional Government and the Central Executive Committee of the Soviets, which was held in the Bolshoi Theatre in Moscow on August 25-28 (12-15), 1917. The State Conference was summoned in order to bolster up the position of the government, which had been shaken by the July demonstration of the Petrograd proletariat. To this Conference were chiefly invited representatives of bourgeois organisations, generals and officers, while even the representatives of the petty-bourgeois defencist democrats were in a minority. A delegation from the Central Executive Committee, consisting of Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries, appeared to represent the Soviets. The Bolshevik members of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee were not permitted to attend the Conference, while the trade unions were allowed to send only a very small delegation. At its meeting on August 18 (5), the Central Committee of the Bolshevik Party decided that the Bolsheviks must organise their fraction at the Conference, but with the sole purpose of making a declaration of protest and withdrawing from the Conference immediately after the présidium had been elected. The Central Committee at the same time decided to issue a manifesto calling for a mass protest against the Conference. This manifesto was published in the press. It declared that the Conference was an attempt on the part of the counter-revolution to create "its own parliament and its own centre," that it was "the organisation of counter-revolutionary conspiracy against the workers," to which the Mensheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionaries were accessories. The manifesto called upon the workers to organise mass protest meetings against these counter-revolutionary machinations of the "saviours" . . . of the "profits of the landlords and capitalists." At the Conference itself a declaration following the lines indicated by the Bolshevik Central Committee was read in the name of the Bolshevik delegates from the trade unions, municipal bodies, workers' co-operatives, etc.

The State Conference opened with a speech by Kerensky, in which he declared that the main task facing the government was to carry on the war, establish order in the army and in the country and to organise a firm government. "I shall put a limit," Kerensky declared, "to the efforts being made to exploit Russia's great misfortune, and, no matter what ultimatums are presented to me, I shall enforce subordination to the supreme government authority and to myself, the supreme representative of that authority." Apart from a speech by Tseretelli supporting the demand for firm government, attention was chiefly attracted by the speech of the Commander-in-Chief of the army, General Kornilov. The latter was at the time openly working for the establishment of his own dictatorship, in which he was supported by the Cadets and by commercial, industrial and banking circles.

"Free Russia received a heritage from the old regime in the shape of the army. . . . That army was in a fighting condition, staunch and prepared for any sacrifice. . . . As the result of a series of legislative measures . . . that army has been transformed into a crazy mob." Hence the necessity for "iron discipline" at the front and "firm government" in the rear. "The measures taken at the front [Kornilov is referring to the introduction of the death penalty.—Ed.] must also be adopted in the rear. . . . There must be no difference between the front and the rear in the severity of regime essential for the salvation of the country. . . . It cannot be tolerated that order at the front shall be the result of the loss of Riga and that order on the railways shall be established at the cost of the surrender of Moldavia and Bessarabia."

General Kaledin, speaking in the name of the Don Cossacks, and supporting Kornilov's demands, advanced the following programme: 1) The army to refrain from politics; 2) the Soviets and army committees to be abolished; 3) the Declaration of Rights of the Soldiers to be revoked; 4) the officers to be given full powers.

Kornilov's and Kaledin's speeches were welcomed by the Rights at the Conference. The "Lefts" or so-called democrats, i.e., the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik leaders of the Soviets, municipal councillors, co-operative employees, etc., confined themselves to a statement of the usual compromising type, which was read in the name of the Central Executive Committee of the Soviets by Chkhheidze.

The State Conference was a public deal between the Menshevik-Socialist-Revolutionary bloc and the counter-revolutionary bourgeoisie against the proletariat and its vanguard—the Bolsheviks. It facilitated the process of differentiation between classes and parties in the country by revealing the counter-revolutionary schemes of the bourgeoisie.

The big bourgeoisie, the Black Hundred landlords, and the counter-revolutionary generals attended the Conference with the intention of dealing a mortal blow to the Russian revolution. They were confident that the country would give its sanction to the coup d'état planned by the bourgeoisie and would consent to the restoration of the monarchy. The counter-revolutionaries hoped at this Conference to proclaim Kornilov military dictator in place of Kerensky, who had already lost credit with the masses. They hoped to stifle the revolution, destroy the Soviets and put an end to the organisations in the army. The bourgeois-monarchist clique pursued a double policy: they endeavoured to reach common ground with the Kerensky government at the Conference, they exchanged handshakes with him on all ceremonial occasions, while in private they thought not so much of reaching common ground with the Provisional Government as of completing preparations for future action (the Kornilov revolt) in order to put an end to the Soviets and to establish their counter-revolutionary military dictatorship. The conspirators drew up their plan of action; the date was appointed. Attempts were made by Kornilov to draft loyal troops into Petrograd and Moscow. And if during the State Conference the coup d'état so eagerly desired by the bourgeoisie did not materialise, it was because the proletariat was on its guard; it was because the proletariat perceived the approaching danger and mobilised its forces accordingly. In this respect of particular importance was the action of the railwaymen in preventing the movement of counter-revolutionary troops into Petrograd and Moscow.

A strike of protest on the part of the Moscow proletariat greeted the State Conference. Forty-one trade unions decided by an overwhelming majority to join the general strike which the Bolsheviks demanded. Four hundred thousand Moscow proletarians came out on a one-day protest strike. The strike found a response in several parts of Russia. By this strike the proletariat expressed its opinion of the State Conference and of the plot being hatched by the monarchist bourgeoisie. The counter-revolutionary generals decided to defer open action, and meanwhile to mobilise their forces and await a more favourable moment in order to strike a mortal blow at the revolution. The Kornilov conspiracy was not abandoned; it was only postponed for a few days.

PAGE 190.* The article "Lessons of the Revolution" was written at the beginning of August (the end of July) 1917 and first appeared in the Bolshevik paper Rabochy (The Worker)—which replaced Pravda after it had been closed down by the Kerensky government—of September 12 and 13 (August 30 and 31). It was then published as a pamphlet with a Postscript dated September 19 (6), 1917. It was intended for the broad masses of workers and peasants, and in extremely simple and clear form presents a summary of the first five months of the revolution, down to July, when the bourgeoisie made its counter-revolutionary attack with the direct aid and support of the petty-bourgeois Socialist parties. Following step by step all the stages of the revolution, and the lessons to be drawn from each of them, and in full conformity with the conclusions he drew from the July events in his articles "On Slogans" and "Constitutional Illusions," Lenin calls upon the toiling masses, and particularly the poor peasants, to "decidedly come over to the side of the revolutionary workers," i.e., to aid the conquest of power by the proletariat.

PAGE 199.* In 1917 Kronstadt was an important revolutionary centre. In the spring the sailors of the Baltic Fleet and the garrison and workers of Kronstadt were in an extremely revolutionary mood and rallied solidly around the Kronstadt Soviet. The Bolshevik organisation in Kronstadt enjoyed great influence among the masses. Kronstadt and the Provisional Government were in perpetual conflict. The reference in the present instance is to the fact that Tseretelli was sent to "calm" Kronstadt in connection with the conflict which occurred in May 1917 (see note to p. 108.*)

PAGE 205.* This letter "To the Central Committee of the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party" was written in connection with the Kornilov events of September 12 (August 30). It was written by Lenin from Helsingfors, where he was at that time hiding from persecution by the Kerensky government. After the July days Kerensky's Provisional Government, the big bourgeoisie, the landlords, Socialist-Revolutionaries, Mensheviks, generals and officers formed a united counter-revolutionary front against the revolutionary proletariat and its vanguard, the Bolsheviks. But within this alliance the bourgeoisie was endeavouring to secure its own undivided dictatorship, which it desired to exercise not through the medium of perpetually vacillating petty bourgeois (Kerensky and the like), but through the medium of determined counter-revolutionaries. As was shown by the August State Conference (see note to p. 188*), the bourgeoisie possessed such a medium in the person of Kornilov and his coadjutors (Kaledin, Alexeyev and other generals). The more the Menshevik-Socialist-Revolutionary bloc lost its influence not only over the workers but also over the peasants, the less the Bolshevik leadership of the proletariat met with competition, and the faster the new revolutionary crisis developed, the less the bourgeoisie felt the need for the services of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks as a screen for its dictatorship, which had virtually been established after the July days, and the more urgently it felt the need of establishing its undivided dictatorship. If the proletarian revolution was to be averted, the mortal blow had to be dealt immediately, before it was too late. The formal deal with the Socialist-Revolutionary-Menshevik bloc did not, therefore, put an end to the Kornilov conspiracy. As stated in the note to p. 188,* this conspiracy was being hatched by Kornilov with the knowledge and consent of the bourgeois party, the Cadets, and the commercial, industrial and banking circles of Moscow. Kerensky himself was implicated in the conspiracy. Following a secret preliminary understanding with the Provisional Government, which needed the support of reliable troops in Petrograd, Kornilov on September 8 (August 26), under the pretext of an anticipated attack by the Bolsheviks, brought to the capital from the front an army corps, several Cossack regiments and the "Savage Division." Simultaneously, Kornilov presented a number of demands to Kerensky which in their essence involved proclaiming Kornilov dictator and forming a new government. The Kerensky government, although it had itself during the July days handed over the power to the counter-revolutionary military clique, hesitated to consent to these demands. After certain vacillations, such as were to be expected from a petty bourgeois at a critical moment, Kerensky was obliged by the pressure of the masses to charge Kornilov with high treason. But it was neither the government nor the Mensheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionaries who assumed the leadership of the struggle against Kornilov. That leadership was assumed by the Bolshevik Party, which at that time already possessed strong fractions within the Petrograd, Moscow and other Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies. Red Guard divisions were organised by the Bolsheviks in the working class quarters of Petrograd. The Bolsheviks mobilised the masses of workers and soldiers, and roused the Soviets. Agitators and revolutionary troops were dispatched by the Soviets to meet the trains bearing Kornilov's army corps. Before they could reach Petrograd, Kornilov's troops were entirely demoralised by revolutionary agitation and proved to be unsuited for the purposes of a counter-revolution. The commander of the army, General Krymov, committed suicide. Kornilov and several other generals were arrested by the Provisional Government. But this was a pure piece of bluff, as was shown by the fact that Kornilov and his generals fled from prison together with the company of Cossacks that guarded them. The escape was effected with the connivance of the Provisional Government.

The Kornilov attempt marked a turning point in the revolution. It clearly revealed to the masses the counter-revolutionary role played by the bourgeoisie and the disastrous consequences which followed from the compromising policy of the Socialist-Revolutionary-Menshevik bloc; it also revealed the bourgeois nature of the Kerensky government, under whose wing the Kornilov plot was hatched. The result of the Kornilov attempt was that the proletariat and the peasantry throughout the country, particularly the poor peasants, became rapidly revolutionised and convinced that the Bolshevik Party was their sole leader and defender of their interests. The Kornilov revolt greatly enhanced the influence of the Bolsheviks in the factory and workshop committees, the trade unions, the Soviets and the army. In September control of the Moscow and Petrograd Soviets passed completely into the hands of the Bolsheviks. The growth of class antagonisms and the contrast between the aims and endeavours of the proletariat and the peasantry and the aims and endeavours of the bourgeoisie and the Provisional Government became each day more and more obvious to the masses. A situation arose in which "the workers and peasants of Russia have absolutely no other way of escape except by undertaking a most determined struggle against, and achieving a victory over, the landlords and bourgeoisie, the Cadet Party, and the generals and officers who sympathise with it." (Lenin, Collected Works, Vol. XXI, "Draft Resolution on the Present Political Situation.") The Kornilov revolt brought home to the working class masses the urgency of the question of a violent seizure of power, and of the necessity of making immediate preparations for an armed insurrection. From that moment on almost every letter and article written by Lenin was devoted to this cardinal and decisive question.

Lenin's letter of September 12 (August 30) deals with the tactics of the Party in relation to the Kerensky government during the struggle against the Kornilov conspiracy. Lenin warns the Party against supporting Kerensky. He points out that the task was to fight Kornilov, but not to support Kerensky; to wage the war against Kornilov in such a way that it "may put us in power." This letter was of a confidential nature and, apart from the members of the Central Committee, was made known to only a few of the Party members.

PAGE 206.* The State Duma was prorogued on March 12 (February 27), 1917, in the early days of the February Revolution, by a ukase of Nicholas II. It however refused to submit to the ukase and set up a Provisional Committee of the State Duma. Neither the first Provisional Government, which itself had close ties with the State Duma, nor the coalition Provisional Government took measures to disperse it. Its reactionary members continued to hold meetings under the title of a Conference of the Members of the State Duma and exercised considerable influence on the policy of the Provisional Government. The Cadet Party placed great hopes in the State Duma; they planned, when the favourable moment arose, to set it up against the Constituent Assembly, the convocation of which was being deliberately delayed. Thus, a bourgeois-landlord organ which had been elected on the basis of the property franchise in force under the autocracy continued to exist even after the autocracy had been overthrown. It was only after the Kornilov revolt that Kerensky's government made up its mind to dissolve the State Duma.

PAGE 207.* V. M—n and V—y. V. P. Milyutin and V. Volodarsky, who at that time were active on Rabochy, the central organ of the Bolshevik Party, instituted, under the general editorship of Stalin, to replace Pravda, which had been closed down by the government. Nos. 1 to 6 of Rabochy, to which Lenin here refers, contained a number of articles by Milyutin and Volodarsky. No. 2 contained a "Letter to the Editors," written by Volodarsky, in which he refutes the incorrect report given by Novaya Zhizn and other papers of a speech he had delivered in the Central Executive Committee of the Soviets. It was this report that called forth Lenin's reproach that he had sunk to defencism (see the beginning of Lenin's letter to the Central Committee, p. 205).

PAGE 208.* The article "Compromises" was printed in Rabochy Put (Worker's Path)—successor to Rabochy when the latter in its turn was closed down by the government—in its number of September 19 (6). It was written by Lenin immediately after the suppression of the Kornilov revolt. The unanimous and vigorous repulse given to Kornilov by the masses provoked a certain temporary inclination on the part of the Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries to disassociate themselves from the counter-revolutionary bourgeoisie. On September 13 (August 31) the Petrograd Soviet by a majority vote adopted a resolution in favour of the creation of a cabinet responsible to the Soviets. A joint session of the Central Executive Committee of the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies and the Executive Committee of the Soviet of Peasants' Deputies by an overwhelming majority adopted a resolution which spoke of the necessity "for creating a strong revolutionary government capable of carrying out the programme of the revolutionary democrats and of conducting a genuine fight against counter-revolution and the external enemy." "Such a government," the resolution went on to say, "created by the democracy and supported by the organs of democracy, must be unencumbered by any compromises with counter-revolutionary elements." The Moscow Committee of the Mensheviks and a number of other Menshevik and Socialist-Revolutionary organisations passed resolutions more or less in the same spirit. The ministers Chernov, a Socialist-Revolutionary, and Peshekhonov, a Narodni-Socialist, or semi-Cadet, resigned from the Provisional Government on the pretext that the latter had refused to endorse Chernov's agrarian bills and had also doubled bread prices in the interests of the large landlords.

These vacillations, on the one hand, and the fact that the Bolsheviks were rapidly gaining control of the Soviets, on the other, for a short time created a situation in which it was possible to propose, as Lenin says, "a return to the pre-July demand: All power to the Soviets and a government of Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks responsible to the Soviets." Lenin considered that "for a few days, or for a week or two," a new government of this character might be created without the participation of the bourgeoisie. This would have been a compromise between the Bolsheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionary-Menshevik bloc; and through this compromise, by means of the struggle within the Soviets, it might have been possible to arrive at "a dictatorship of the proletariat and the poor peasantry," just as might have been the case had the Socialist-Revolutionary-Menshevik Soviets taken over the power before the July days; but now it could be accomplished much more rapidly than was at that time possible.

But this idea of Lenin's was not fated to be realised. The inclination of the Mensheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionaries to dissociate themselves from the counter-revolutionary bourgeoisie was too short-lived and did not lead to a refusal to collaborate with the capitalists. Once again, about three weeks after the article "Compromises" was written, Lenin for the last time returned, but only for a brief period, to the thought of "a peaceful development of the revolution" (see "The Aims of the Revolution," pp. 240-49 in the present volume).

PAGE 208. The reference is to two articles written by Engels in 1870, "The Programme of the Blanquist Communards" and "The Blanquists." Criticising the programme and tactics of the Blanquists, who later, in 1873, were to split away from the First International to form their own group called "The Revolutionary Commune" and to issue a manifesto "To the Communards" on behalf of that group, Engels has the following to say on the subject of the Blanquists' rejection of compromises:

"The German Communists are Communists because throughout all the intermediate stations and compromises, which are created not by them but by historical development, they clearly perceive and pursue the final aim, viz., the abolition of classes and the creation of a society in which there will be no private ownership in land or in the means of production. The thirty-three [Blanquists] are Communists because they imagine that merely because they have the good intentions of skipping intermediate stations and compromises, that settles the matter, and if 'it begins' in the next few days—as has been definitely settled—and they once come to the helm,

'communism will be introduced' the day after tomorrow. If this is not immediately possible, they are not Communists. What childish innocence it is to present impatience as a theoretically convincing argument!"

PAGE 208. Lenin's views on participation in the State Duma will be found in the following articles in the Selected Works, Vol. III: "The Boycott of the Bulygin Duma and the Insurrection," "Should We Boycott the State Duma?" "The Boycott," "Blocs with the Cadets" and "Against the Boycott."

PAGE 209.* Regarding these crises, cf. "Lessons of the Crisis," "The 'Crisis of Power,'" "The Eighteenth of June," "Lessons of the Revolution" and the letter "To the Central Committee of the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party," in the present volume.

PAGE 212.* The Commune of 1871, or the Paris Commune, was proclaimed by the proletariat of Paris on March 18, 1871, and fell on May 28, 1871. Marx and Engels regarded the Paris Commune as the first experiment by the proletariat in the establishment of its class dictatorship. Unfortunately the French proletariat at that time was still insufficiently organised and did not possess a united political party—the leadership of the movement was entrusted to people belonging to different political tendencies. Moreover, the proletariat of Paris failed to effect an alliance with the peasantry. But what was particularly fatal for the Commune was that it did not display sufficient revolutionary determination; for instance, it left the bank, with the vast wealth in its vaults, in the hands of the enemy. The Commune was equally irresolute in fighting the bourgeoisie, which fled to Versailles. It let the favourable moment slip when Versailles could have been crushed. The bourgeoisie was thus able to mobilise reinforcements for the defence of Versailles and for the destruction of the Commune. The bourgeois government at Versailles, headed by Thiers, succeeded in rallying an army against revolutionary Paris, and, assisted by its recent enemy, the German army, suppressed the Commune with the utmost brutality. The last barricades of the Communards fell on May 28, 1871. The Russian proletariat in its own revolution profited by the lessons of the Paris Commune. The Bolshevik Party had made a careful study of the achievements and errors of the Commune.

PAGE 215.* The letter "The Bolsheviks Must Assume Power" and the one following it in the present volume, "Marxism and Insurrection," and also the article "The Crisis Has Matured" all dwell insistently on one and the same theme—the necessity of proceeding with the least possible delay to the organisation of armed insurrection, for otherwise the favourable moment might pass. Lenin's insistence on this was motivated by the relative strength of the forces of revolution and counter-revolution as described by Lenin in his letters, and by the situation within the Central Committee, in which Kamenev and Zinoviev, with several others who shared their views (e.g., Rykov), were advocating the position Kamenev held in April. This position amounted to an endeavour to prevent the revolution from going beyond its bourgeois-democratic phase—from which it was in fact already emerging—and becoming transformed into a proletarian revolution. This attitude was manifested in relation to the Democratic Conference summoned by the Provisional Government. The rapidly growing influence of the Bolsheviks not only among the proletariat, but also in the army and among the peasants, and the fact that the Bolsheviks had gained control over a number of Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, including the Petrograd and Moscow Soviets, caused profound confusion in the ranks of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks and in the Provisional Government. They felt the ground slipping from under their feet. They had lost the support of the masses. In order to save the situation, they again, as in August 1917 (in the case of the State Conference—see note to p. 188 *), resorted to an alliance of "the vital forces of the country," in other words, the bourgeoisie of town and country, including the kulaks, and the petty bourgeoisie that supported it, against the revolutionary masses. The Democratic Conference was to assist the creation of such an alliance and of a government representing that alliance. This necessitated falsifying the vote of the toilers and guaranteeing preponderance to the vote of the kulaks, the Menshevik and Socialist-Revolutionary co-operators, and the bourgeois intellectual supporters of Kornilov. Accordingly, preferential representation at the Democratic Conference was given to the city councils, Zemstvos, and co-operative organisations, whereas the number of representatives from the Soviets, the army organisations, the trade unions and the factory and workshop committees was reduced.

The Democratic Conference sat in Petrograd from September 27 (14) to October 5 (September 22). The composition of the Conference was extremely heterogeneous. After much wavering, the Conference expressed itself in favour of a coalition government, but without the participation of the Cadets. But even this latter, purely formal, injunction was not observed by the Provisional Government and its supporters, the Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries. After the Conference, Kerensky formed a cabinet in which posts were offered to Moscow industrialists and leaders of the Cadet Party, the pretext being that the Cadet ministers formed part of the government not in the capacity of representatives of their party, but as individuals. The Democratic Conference appointed from among its members a Provisional Council of the Republic (or "Pre-parliament," as it was called). Supplemented by representatives of the big bourgeoisie, the Provisional Council of the Republic was to act as a representative advisory body until the convocation of the Constituent Assembly, the appointment of which was perpetually being delayed.

The Bolshevik fraction at the Democratic Conference drew up a detailed political declaration, which was announced at the session of October 1 (September 18).

The declaration followed the lines indicated by Lenin. It consisted of a merciless criticism of the policy pursued by the purely bourgeois and the coalition governments during the six months of the revolution; it exposed the treacherous role played by the bloc of Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks at every stage of the revolution, and described the coalition government as a government "of violence and repression exercised by the upper orders against the lower orders."

The declaration asserted that only a power "based directly on the struggle of the proletariat and peasantry" could save the country from the catastrophic situation in which it found itself. "Enough of vacillation... enough of wavering... enough of the equivocal policy which the Menshevik and Socialist-Revolutionary leaders have been pursuing.... The decisive hour has arrived," the declaration stated, going on to say that the new revolutionary government must abolish private ownership in land, must introduce workers' control over production and distribution, must immediately propose a democratic peace to the peoples of all the warring states and annul the secret treaties, must guarantee the right of self-determination to all the nations inhabiting Russia, must abolish the death penalty at the front and all repressive measures against the working class and its organisations, must proceed to the universal arming of the workers and the organisation of a Red Guard, must establish an eight-hour working day, etc., etc. (The full text of this declaration will be found in the appendix to Lenin's Collected Works, Vol. XXI.)

The line of the Party with regard to the Democratic Conference is expressed with exceptional vigour and clarity in Lenin's letters entitled "The Bolsheviks Must Assume Power" and "Marxism and Insurrection." At the meeting of the Central Committee held on September 28 (15) this line was opposed by Kamenev, Zinoviev and Rykov, while Lenin's standpoint was defended with the greatest consistency by Stalin. These letters of Lenin's which called for the organisation of armed insurrection, and consequently rejected participation in the Democratic Conference, were discussed at a meeting of the Central Committee held on September 28 (15). The minutes of the meeting contain the following record:

"Agenda: Letters from Lenin. Decided: To appoint a meeting of the Central Committee at an early date to consider questions of tactics. Comrade Stalin proposed that the letters be sent for discussion to the more important of the organisations. Decided to postpone the question to the next meeting of the Central Committee. The following question was put to the vote: Who is in favour of only one copy of the letters being preserved? For—six, against—four, abstained from voting—six. Kamenev moved the following resolution: 'Having discussed Lenin's letters, the Central Committee rejects the practical proposals contained in them, calls upon all the organisations to follow only the instructions of the Central Committee and again asserts that at the present moment the Central Committee considers that no street action of any kind can be permitted. At the same time, the Central Committee requests Comrade Lenin to elaborate his opinion of the present situation and the policy of the Party in the form of a pamphlet.' Resolution rejected. In conclusion, the following resolution was adopted:

'Members of the Central Committee active in the Military Organisation and the Petrograd Committee are instructed to take measures to prevent all action in the barracks and the factories.'

Zinoviev's and Kamenev's differences with the Party on the question of armed insurrection were sharply defined at this meeting. The conflict grew steadily more acute and in October led to an open rupture between Kamenev and Zinoviev, on the one hand, and Lenin and the majority of the Central Committee, on the other. It resulted in Kamenev's and Zinoviev's strike-breaking on the eve of the October Revolution and to their desertion, and the desertion of their followers, from Party and Soviet posts immediately after the October Revolution (cf. in the present volume "A Letter to the Comrades," "A Letter to the Members of the Bolshevik Party," "A Letter to the Central Committee of the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party," "From the Central Committee of the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party [Bolsheviks] to Comrades Kamenev, Zinoviev, Ryazanov and Larin" and "From the Central Committee of the Russian Social-Democratic Party [Bolsheviks] to All Party Members and to All the Toiling Classes of Russia," and notes to pp. 303,* 304,* and 412 *).

PAGE 215. According to the official figures, in the elections to the Moscow City Duma held July 8-11 (June 25-28), 1917, the Cadets received 109,000 votes and thirty-four seats; the Narodni-Socialists, 8,000 votes and three seats; the Socialist-Revolutionaries, 375,000 votes and 116 seats; the Mensheviks and "Internationalists," 76,000 votes and twenty-four seats; the Bolsheviks, 75,000 votes and forty-three seats; while the Yedinstvo group (the Plekhanovists) received 1,500 votes and not a single seat.

In the elections to the Moscow Borough Dumas held on October 7-9 (September 24-26), 1917, the Bolsheviks received 52 per cent of the total vote. In all, there were elected 350 Bolsheviks, 184 Cadets, 104 Socialist-Revolutionaries, 31 Mensheviks and several non-partisan deputies. The soldiers of the Moscow garrison voted en masse for the Bolshevik candidates. All the Dumas in the outlying boroughs of Moscow, as also the borough administrations appointed by them, were won by the Bolsheviks.

PAGE 215. In the elections to the Petrograd and Moscow Soviets held in September, the Bolsheviks obtained an overwhelming majority in both these Soviets. The Petrograd Soviet on September 13 (August 31) and the Moscow Soviet on September 18 (15) adopted Bolshevik political resolutions. Trotsky, at that time a member of the Bolshevik Party, was elected Chairman of the Petrograd Soviet, and V. P. Nogin, a Bolshevik, Chairman of the Moscow Soviet.

PAGE 216.* Towards the end of the summer of 1917 the German armies had gained a number of important successes on the Western front, while German submarines had established a virtual blockade of the British Isles. There was a growing feeling both in Great Britain and in Germany favouring the conclusion of peace. The diplomats on both sides were sounding the situation with a view to agreement. But America's entry into the war and the vast reinforcements poured into France by the American government sharply turned the balance of forces, and in 1918 resulted in a victory for the Entente.

PAGE 218.* Engels speaks of insurrection as an art in his book Germany: Revolution and Counter-Revolution, the authorship of which until recently was attributed to Marx. Marx, it is true, participated in giving the book its final form. The passage on insurrection as an art will be found in Chap. XVII. It is quoted by Lenin in full in his Postscript to the article "Can the Bolsheviks Retain State Power?" (pp. 291-92 in the present volume).

PAGE 223.* The Alexandrinsky Theatre—in Petrograd, where the Democratic Conference was held.

The Peter and Paul fortress—in the centre of Petrograd, on the Neva, opposite the Winter Palace. In the time of the tsars the Peter and Paul fortress was used as a prison for revolutionaries.

PAGE 227.* Dubasov spoke at a meeting of the Petrograd Soviet on October 5 (September 22), 1917, during the discussion of a report on the Democratic Conference. Rabochy Put of October 6 (September 23) thus reported his speech: "Comrade Dubasov, who has arrived from the front, in the course of his speech declared that what the soldiers want just now is neither freedom nor land. They want only one thing—that the war be stopped. Whatever you may say here, the soldiers will not fight any longer." The newspaper reported that this statement produced a profound impression on the audience.

PAGE 229.* Chaps. I, II, III and V were printed in No. 30 of Rabochy Put. Chap. IV was entirely omitted. The part of the MS. still extant contains only Chaps. V and VI. The contents of Chap. IV therefore remain unknown and are accordingly omitted in this volume. It is to be presumed that Rabochy Put refrained from printing Chap. IV from motives of secrecy.

PAGE 230.* When Lenin says that there was a tendency within the Central Committee which favoured waiting for the Congress of Soviets and was opposed to the immediate seizure of power and an immediate insurrection, he is referring on the one hand to Trotsky, whose opinion it was that the insurrection must unconditionally be associated with the Congress of Soviets (see note to p. 399 *), and, on the other, to Kamenev, Zinoviev and those who shared their views, who were opposed to insurrection generally and preferred a "parliamentary" development of the revolution along bourgeois-democratic lines. They assigned the Bolshevik Party the role of an extreme Left opposition within the future Constituent Assembly and endeavoured in every way to postpone the question of insurrection. Zinoviev and Kamenev also objected to the boycott of the Pre-parliament. Later, at the decisive sessions of the Central Committee held on October 23 (10) and October 29 (16), Kamenev and Zinoviev came out openly against armed insurrection.

PAGE 230. "Lieber-Dans" (Lieber-Danism)—a combination of the names Lieber and Dan, two leaders of the Mensheviks and of the Menshevik-Socialist-Revolutionary Central Executive Committee of the Soviets. The Bolshevik press in 1917 used these terms as a label for the policy of compromise and treachery pursued by the Mensheviks in the Soviets and the Provisional Government. The term Lieber-Dan was minted by Demyan Bedny, the proletarian poet, in one of his verses written in 1917.

PAGE 232.* To judge from the minutes of the proceedings of the Central Committee, the circumstances which induced Lenin to tender his resignation from that body were as follows.

Lenin in the middle of September had proposed to the Central Committee that preparations for armed insurrection be undertaken immediately, but the majority of the Central Committee declined to adopt his point of view for several weeks. During this period the Central Committee decided to participate in the Democratic Conference and in the Pre-parliament. Even before this decision had been taken, in the middle of September, when discussing the question of the composition of the presidium of the Petrograd Soviet, the Central Committee adopted a decision to the effect that "the presidium must be formed on a coalition basis on the principle of proportional representation; thus in the new presidium, in addition to the seven representatives proposed by the Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries, there must be seven representatives of the Bolsheviks." This decision was taken at a time when the Bolsheviks had already secured a majority in the Petrograd Soviet. Certain members of the Central Committee (Zinoviev, for instance) justified this decision of the Central Committee on the grounds that the latter, desiring to maintain a united Socialist front, decided in favour of a coalition presidium in order to show that in its opinion the government should be formed on the same principle, viz., as a coalition of all the Socialist parties, and that coalition with the bourgeoisie should be rejected. As will be seen from this article, Lenin regarded both the decision to participate in the Pre-parliament elected by the Democratic Conference and the decision to grant the Mensheviks places on the presidium of the Petrograd Soviet as "a glaring error." Lenin criticises these errors and once more insists that immediate preparations for armed insurrection be undertaken.

The minutes of the Central Committee contain no record showing that Lenin's declaration of resignation was discussed by that body. It may be judged that the question lost all significance as Lenin's point of view triumphed. The Central Committee adopted a decision to withdraw from the Pre-parliament and proceeded to make preparations for armed insurrection.

PAGE 233.* The article "From a Publicist's Diary. The Mistakes of Our Party" was written at the same time as the two letters to the Central Committee and the article "The Crisis Has Matured" which precede it in this volume. "From a Publicist's Diary," however, was not printed at the time. It was first published in 1924 in Proletarskaya Revolutsiya in accordance with a text preserved by a member of the Communist Party, Tayezhnik, who states that in September 1917 "it was passed around in the Viborg District" of Petrograd.

In this article Lenin, in accordance with the general position he held immediately before the October Revolution, deals with the question of the attitude which must be adopted towards the Democratic Conference and the Pre-parliament elected by the Conference (see note to p. 215 *). As has already been stated in the notes to pp. 215 * and 232,* Lenin's demand for the immediate organisation of armed insurrection and the boycott of the Democratic Conference and the Pre-parliament was resisted by Kamenev, Zinoviev and Rykov, and met with a vacillating reception on the part of several other members of the Central Committee. The question of withdrawing from the Democratic Conference was discussed at a session of the Central Committee held on October 4 (September 21), 1917. In the minutes of this session the following record is preserved:

"On the question of the Democratic Conference it was decided not to withdraw, but to recall the members of our Party from the presidium. As to the Pre-parliament, it was decided by nine votes to eight not to participate. In view of the fact that the vote was equally divided, the final decision of the question to be submitted to a Party Conference, to be immediately summoned, consisting of the Bolshevik fraction of the Democratic Conference."

The meeting of the Bolshevik fraction of the Democratic Conference was held on October 4 (September 21). Stalin and Trotsky spoke in favour of boycotting the Pre-parliament, Kamenev and Rykov against. There is no report available of this meeting. All we have is the following statement in the minutes of the proceedings of the Central Committee:

"At the Conference a decision was taken by seventy-seven votes to fifty to participate in the Pre-parliament, which decision was confirmed by the Central Committee." The question of boycotting the Pre-parliament was again discussed at a meeting of the Central Committee held on October 18 (5). "After a discussion, a decision was adopted, with only one dissentient, to read a declaration and to withdraw from the Pre-parliament on the very first day it meets. The theses of the declaration were adopted, while the compilation of the text was entrusted to the editorial board of the central organ of the Party."

The single vote against the decision to withdraw from the Pre-parliament was cast by Kamenev, who had the following statement inserted in his name in the minutes of the Central Committee:

"To the Central Committee of the R.S.D.L.P. Dear comrades, I consider that your decision to withdraw at the first session from the 'Council of the Russian Republic' [the official title of the Pre-parliament.—Ed.] predetermines the tactics of the Party for the immediate future in a direction which I personally consider extremely dangerous. While submitting to the decision of the Party, I request the comrades to release me from my duties on representative bodies (the Central Executive Committee, etc.) and to entrust me with some other kind of work. October 18 (5), 1917. Kamenev."

The Bolshevik fraction, having read its declaration, withdrew from the Pre-parliament at the first session of the latter, held on October 20 (7).

PAGE 236.* The regime of June 3—instituted by Stolypin after the arbitrary dissolution of the Second Duma and the arrest of the Social-Democratic deputies on June 3, 1907. A new electoral law was promulgated which greatly curtailed the franchise and was designed to guarantee the predominance in the Duma of the reactionary big landlords and bourgeoisie.

PAGE 240.* The article "The Aims of the Revolution" was printed in Rabochy Put on October 22 and 23 (9 and 10), 1917. Having declared that the immediate duty of the proletariat and the Bolshevik Party was to seize power, Lenin in September and October 1917, in two long articles, entitled "The Threatening Catastrophe and How to Fight It," and "Can the Bolsheviks Retain State Power?" set forth the programme of the proletarian revolution. This programme fundamentally coincided with that which Lenin had already set forth in his April Theses on "The Tasks of the Proletariat in the Present Revolution" (pp. 21-26 in the present volume) and "The Tasks of the Proletariat in Our Revolution" (pp. 45-76 in the present volume). It was, however, now enriched and supported by the experience of the revolutionary struggle waged against the bourgeois government and the petty-bourgeois parties gained in the period April to September 1917, and of the counter-revolutionary offensive launched by the bourgeoisie with the help of the petty-bourgeois parties after July. Now that the Soviets in all the industrial centres of the country, and particularly in Petrograd and Moscow, had been won over, and that the Bolshevik Party was on the verge of gaining control of practically every Soviet in the country, the transfer of the entire power to the Soviets once more became the basic demand of the programme, since these Soviets were no longer Menshevik-Socialist-Revolutionary Soviets, but Bolshevik Soviets. Of the two articles quoted, only one, "Can the Bolsheviks Retain State Power?" is reproduced in this volume. The article "The Threatening Catastrophe and How to Fight It" is replaced in this volume by another, "The Aims of the Revolution," which in the main reproduced the contents of the former, but in a more simple and popular form.

PAGE 241.* When the masses began to desert the petty-bourgeois parties, a process of rapid disintegration of the latter set in, a clear illustration of which is the growth of opposition groups within these parties to which Lenin here refers. The Left Wing of the Mensheviks—the Martov group (Menshevik-Internationalists—see note to p. 125 )—began to gain strength. During the July days Martov demanded the transfer of power to the Soviets; after the Kornilov revolt he opposed the participation of the bourgeoisie in the government, while in the Democratic Conference he read a declaration on October 1 (September 18) in the name of “the majority of the Soviet delegation,” which spoke of the necessity of “vigorously rejecting all agreements with the propertied elements” (i.e., the bourgeoisie) and proposed “that every effort be made to create a truly revolutionary power” pending the convocation of the Constituent Assembly.

In the Socialist-Revolutionary Party, the Left trend, headed by Spiridonova, Kamkov, and others, rapidly gained strength. At the Socialist-Revolutionary Party Council (the Council was something between a plenum of the Central Committee and a Party Conference) which sat on August 19-23 (6-10), 1917, the Left Wing was strongly represented. It consisted principally of individuals who subsequently, in November 1917, split away and formed the Party of Left Socialist-Revolutionary Internationalists. The principal resolution proposed at the Council, dealing with the current situation, which approved the policy of the Central Committee of the Socialist-Revolutionary Party and expressed itself unconditionally in favour of supporting the Provisional Government, secured fifty-four votes. A counter-resolution proposed by the opposition, criticising the activities of the Provisional Government, demanding that its counter-revolutionary measures be resisted and expressing itself in favour of a government of revolutionary democrats “responsible to the Soviets,” secured thirty-five votes. The Seventh Petrograd Conference of the Socialist-Revolutionary Party, held on September 23 (10), was conducted under the leadership of the Left Wing, which demanded the rejection of the policy of coalition and the formation of a government based on the Soviets. The resolution adopted at this Conference demanded that a homogeneous government responsible to the organs of revolutionary democracy be formed; that all land be placed under the charge of Land Committees; that state control of production through the medium of the factory and workshop committees be instituted; that an eight-hour working day be legally sanctioned; that the maximum amount of taxation be imposed on the possessing classes; that the army be democratised; that “a vigorous campaign against the war” be initiated; that the principle of the self-determination of nations be put into effect; that the counter-revolutionary organisations, the State Duma and the State Council, be dissolved; that the death penalty at the front be abolished and that an investigation into the Kornilov revolt be instituted. The majority of the Petrograd Committee of the Socialist-Revolutionary Party elected at this Conference consisted of Left Socialist-Revolutionaries.

PAGE 242.* Lenin is referring to the events of September 3 (August 21), 1917, when the German army broke the front and occupied Riga. The Russian troops, particularly the Latvian rifle regiments, put up a vigorous resistance. Statements at that time appeared in the press to the effect that the higher command had deliberately paralysed the resistance of the army at Riga, the purpose being to create a menace to revolutionary Petrograd, to provoke a panic in the country, to exert pressure upon the Mensheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionaries and to secure the withdrawal from Petrograd of troops loyal to the revolution. The bourgeois press made use of the German seizure of Riga for the purpose of counter-revolutionary agitation; it laid the blame upon the soldiers and the Bolsheviks and foretold (and provoked) the advance of the Germans on Petrograd.

PAGE 250.* The article "Can the Bolsheviks Retain State Power?" was written in October 1917 and printed in the Bolshevik journal Prosveshchenie. As already stated in the note to p. 240,* this article, together with the pamphlet The Threatening Catastrophe and How to Fight It, written somewhat earlier, and the popular article "The Aims of the Revolution," presents a programme for the impending proletarian revolution. As in other of Lenin's writings in 1917, the aims of the revolution, and the arguments proving the inevitability of the revolution and the ability of the proletariat and the proletarian party to retain power, are presented in this article in conjunction with a biting criticism of the petty-bourgeois "Socialist" parties and groups. In the article in question Lenin's criticism is aimed principally at the Novaya Zhizn-ists (a group of petty-bourgeois intellectuals organised around the paper Novaya Zhizn [New Life], which was published in 1917 with the close collaboration of Maxim Gorky, Himmer-Sukhanov, and Bazarov). The Novaya Zhizn-ists regarded themselves as internationalists. They endeavoured to dissociate themselves from the Mensheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionaries. But, as a matter of fact, their main positions closely resembled those of the Mensheviks, and they were in perpetual conflict with the Bolsheviks. When the proletarian revolution became an issue of the day, the Novaya Zhizn-ists endeavoured to hinder its development in every possible way, arguing that any attempt on the part of the working class to seize power would lead to its isolation from the democracy, and that, even if it succeeded in seizing power, it could not retain it. Thus the Novaya Zhizn-ists to a certain extent buttressed the position of Kamenev, Zinoviev and the other Right Bolsheviks. It was the duty of a party that was leading the proletariat to the socialist revolution to demonstrate to the proletariat the puerility of the arguments of the Novaya Zhizn-ists and to show that these arguments were in the long run only bringing grist to the mill of the bourgeoisie; it was its duty, further, on the basis of this criticism, to prove that all the conditions existed which made for the success of the proletariat and which would enable it to retain power; and finally it was its duty to set forth a programme for the revolution. And these tasks are accomplished by Lenin in the article "Can the Bolsheviks Retain State Power?" In this article Lenin chiefly dwells on the political aspects of the revolution and treats its economic aspects very briefly, since they are dealt with in detail in the pamphlet The Threatening Catastrophe and How to Fight It and in the article "The Aims of the Revolution."

The main demands contained in Lenin's programme on the eve of the October Revolution were the transfer of the entire power to the Soviets, the nationalisation of the land, the fusion of all the banks into one single bank or their nationalisation, the nationalisation of the trusts and syndicates, compulsory trustification, i.e., the combination of capitalist enterprises into trusts and syndicates, the compulsory organisation of the population into consumers' co-operative societies, and the establishment of universal workers' control over production and distribution. This programme was designed to achieve the establishment of the dictatorship of the proletariat and the withdrawal of Russia from the imperialist war; it contained measures directed against economic disruption, the decline of production, and famine, and was designed to create the conditions that would facilitate socialist construction. While it was a programme of the socialist revolution, its purpose at the same time was that this revolution should in passing solve the problems of the bourgeois-democratic revolution, which the bourgeoisie and its henchmen, the petty-bourgeois parties, had proved incapable of solving. The solution of the problems of the proletarian socialist revolution, coupled with an alliance between the working class and the poor peasants, would secure for the proletariat and its party the sympathies of the middle peasant, who accordingly would take a neutral position in respect of the seizure of power by the proletariat. This was to be the first stage towards the establishment of a firm alliance between the proletariat and the middle peasantry in the future. Similarly, the abolition of national oppression and the establishment of the equality of all nations would secure the support of the toiling masses of the hitherto oppressed nationalities of the country.

PAGE 252.* In describing the Novaya Zhizn-ists as quarter-Bolsheviks, Lenin was referring to the vacillating intermediary position they occupied between the Bolsheviks and the Mensheviks before the October Revolution (see the preceding note). They preferred the Pre-parliament and subsequently the Constituent Assembly to the Soviets, and thus completely identified themselves with the Mensheviks. From quarter-Bolsheviks they soon became transformed, as Lenin expressed it, into "contemptible fools" and henchmen of the counter-revolution.

PAGE 252. The Novaya Zhizn-ists are here referring to a resolution proposed by the Menshevik Tseretelli at the Democratic Conference and to the mention made in that resolution of the declaration (or platform) adopted on August 27 (14), 1917, by the Moscow State Conference. This declaration was made by the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks in the name of the revolutionary democracy and spoke in high-flown language of democracy, peace, the fighting capacity of the army, etc. This declaration was nothing but a screen for the fact that these parties were continuing their policy of alliance with the bourgeoisie against the proletariat, of fighting the war to a victorious conclusion and of delaying decision of the urgent problems raised by the revolution.

PAGE 253.* Kuskova and Berkenheim represented the bourgeois co-operative societies at the Democratic Conference and the Pre-parliament, while Chaikovsky (who later, during the Civil War, was to be a member of the White Guard government in Archangel) represented the Menshevik-Socialist-Revolutionary Central Executive Committee of the Soviets.

PAGE 257.* Lenin is referring to an item which appeared in the Left Socialist-Revolutionary paper, Znamya Truda (Banner of Labour), dealing with the attitude of the peasantry towards the coalition government.

Znamya Truda began to appear on September 5 (August 23), 1917. It was edited among others by Spiridonova and Kamkov, and served as the organ of the Petrograd Committee of the Socialist-Revolutionary Party, which at that time was in opposition to the Central Committee of that Party (see note to p. 241 *). After the split which took place in that party, Znamya Truda became the central organ of the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries. The paper was closed down by the Soviet government in connection with the revolt of the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries in July 1918.

PAGE 257. The reference is to a conference of representatives from the Executive Committees of the Soviets of Peasants' Deputies summoned by the Executive Committee of the All-Russian Soviet of Peasants' Deputies and held on September 29-31 (16-18), 1917.

PAGE 260.* Lenin is referring to the extreme Right Menshevik group, Yedinstvo, which was headed by Plekhanov, and to the extreme Right group of the Socialist-Revolutionary Party, which possessed its own Organisational Bureau and its own paper, Volya Naroda. This latter group was headed by Breshko-Breshkovskaya, Savinkov, Kerensky and Argunov. During the elections to the Constituent Assembly this group in certain places put forward joint lists of candidates with the Yedinstvo group and the Narodni-Socialists. Their refusal to support the lists of candidates of the Socialist-Revolutionary Party was due to the fact that these lists included Left Socialist-Revolutionaries.

PAGE 260. The Socialist-Revolutionary Centre consisted of the majority of the members of that party and was headed by Chernov, Gotz and Zenzinov. In practice they differed very little from the extreme Right Wing of the Socialist-Revolutionary Party, just as the latter group differed very little from the Cadets. They were, however, more sensitive to the vacillations of the petty bourgeoisie. On the fundamental question of government power, the "leader of the Centre," Chernov, declared at the session of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee of the Soviets held on September 25 (12) that "collaboration with non-Socialist elements was undoubtedly acceptable," and when this question was voted he was the only one of the 221 deputies to abstain from voting. At the Democratic Conference the Chernov Centre expressed itself in favour of a coalition government, but without the Cadets. After the October Revolution Chernov, together with the extreme Right Socialist-Revolutionaries, went over to the camp of the open counter-revolutionaries. Together with them they assisted the imperialists to organise military intervention, and in conjunction with the Cadets and other bourgeois and landlord groups organised uprisings against the Soviet government on the Volga, in the Urals, and other places.

PAGE 265.* Lenin's demand for workers' control was endorsed by the First Conference of the Factory and Workshop Committees of Petrograd, which met on June 12 (May 30), 1917, upon the initiative of the workers of the Putilov and other large works. The political leadership of the Bolshevik Party prevailed at this Conference. The Organisation Bureau had issued an appeal to the workers announcing the summoning of the Conference well in advance of the date appointed for its convocation. As a result the working class masses were well represented at the Conference.

The demand for workers' control was raised at the Conference by the Bolsheviks as an urgent measure in order to prevent the disorganisation of production as a result of the sabotage of the capitalists, but as a measure which could be made effective only when the proletariat had assumed power. The Novaya Zhizn-ists (a group of petty-bourgeois intellectuals organised around the paper Novaya Zhizn, whose views in a more or less concealed form coincided with those of the Mensheviks) failed to understand that the demand for workers' control was advanced as a revolutionary slogan and was associated with the seizure of power by the working class. At this Conference of Factory and Workshop Committees the Novaya Zhizn-ists accused the Bolsheviks of anarcho-syndicalism. They proposed their own resolution in opposition to that of the Bolsheviks. In this resolution they proposed state control in place of workers' control; but they entirely evaded the question of the class character of the state; they said nothing about the overthrow of the bourgeois government and the establishment of the dictatorship of the proletariat. In other words, they proposed that control over the capitalists should be exercised by a government of capitalists. The Conference rejected the resolution of the Novaya Zhizn-ists and adopted the resolution of the Bolsheviks, in the concluding part of which it was plainly stated that workers' control could be instituted "only after the entire power of the state had passed into the hands of the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies."

The Conference discussed a number of other questions, e.g., the tasks of the factory and workshop committees, attitude towards the higher trade union bodies, and unemployment. The Conference elected a Central Council of Factory and Workshop Committees consisting of twenty-five persons. The Central Council of Factory and Workshop Committees before the October Revolution virtually acted as a national centre and as the organiser of the working class masses for the final struggle.

PAGE 267.* The reference is to the defeat of the French army in the Franco-Prussian War of 1870-71. Napoleon III with the greater part of his army was surrounded and captured at Sedan.

PAGE 268.* The reference is to the scale of taxation on large incomes instituted by Minister Shingarev. Even the Provisional Government decided that this scale was inadequate and established an income tax of 30 per cent. When he speaks of levying taxes even on the Shingarev scale, Lenin is referring to the fact that neither the 30 per cent scale nor the Shingarev scale was ever made effective. The Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks refrained from instituting an income tax for fear that the bourgeois ministers would resign. The retention of the old system of assessing incomes and the preservation of the old income tax machinery and personnel, together with the steady depreciation of the currency, made it easy for the bourgeoisie to conceal their true incomes and get off with the payment of only the most insignificant taxes. The agents both of the Ministry for Finance and of the bourgeois press endeavoured to place the burden of taxation upon the shoulders of the toiling masses. The Cadet paper, Rech, wrote that "in Russia, which is poor in capital, the state treasury can hold out only if replenished mainly from the purse of the people." The Provisional Government did everything it could to protect the vast profits of the capitalists and did not pass a single extraordinary measure of taxation on large incomes.

PAGE 271.* During the period February to October 1917 the numerical strength of the Bolshevik Party increased as follows: at the All-Russian Party Conference held in April 1917, 76,000 members were represented; at the Sixth Party Congress, held in August, the delegates represented 177,000 Party members, while the number of Party members by the time of the Congress had reached 240,000. This is the figure Lenin uses, although the numerical strength of the Party by the time of the October Revolution had undoubtedly become much greater.

PAGE 279.* The man in a muffler—the type of petty-bourgeois, respectable, middle-class citizen; he fears all innovations, initiative and risk, and is a stickler for routine. The type is portrayed in Chekhov's short story, The Man in a Muffler. Lenin applies the term to the opportunists and the compromising parties, who feared revolutionary action and hindered and condemned the revolutionary initiative of the masses and the proletarian party.

After the collapse of the Revolution of 1905 he applied this term to the Mensheviks, who had condemned the December insurrection, and to Plekhanov, who had declared that "they should not have resorted to arms." Comparing this pedantic, soulless utterance with Marx's enthusiastic laudation of the Paris Communards—that they were "prepared to storm the heavens"—Lenin said:

"Oh, how our present 'realist' wiseacres among the Marxists, who are deriding revolutionary romanticism in Russia in 1906-07, would have scoffed at Marx at that time! How they would have mocked at the materialist and economist, the enemy of utopia, who pays homage to an 'attempt' to 'storm heaven'!"

"What a flood of tears these 'men in mufflers' would have shed, what condescending smiles or commiseration they would have bestowed upon him for his rebel tendencies, utopianism, etc., etc., and for his estimation of this heaven-storming movement!" (Preface to Letters to Dr. Kugelmann.)

PAGE 281.* Tseretelli's fake Bulygin Duma—i.e., the "Pre-parliament" (see note to p. 215 *). By comparing the Pre-parliament to the Bulygin Duma, Lenin desires to emphasise the similarity of the roles played by these two bodies. It was the endeavour of the Kerensky regime in 1917, as of the tsarist government in 1905, to fool the masses and divert them from revolution. Terrified by the powerful strike movement provoked by the events of January 22 (9), 1905, the tsar issued a ukase for the summoning of a Duma, the statutes of which were drawn up by Bulygin. This Duma was to be merely a deliberative body without legislative functions. The franchise was not extended to the workers, while the electors from the peasants were to be selected under the control of the Zemsky Nachalniki (rural government prefects). Lenin demanded the boycott of the Pre-parliament in 1917, just as he had demanded the boycott of the Bulygin Duma in 1905. And just as in 1905 he had called upon the masses to attack tsarism, so now, in 1917, he called upon them to mobilise their forces against the Kerensky government.

PAGE 283.* The mutiny in the German navy involved the crews of four German dreadnoughts anchored in Wilhelmshafen and of the cruiser Nürnberg, which at that time was on the high seas. The mutineers demanded the immediate cessation of war and the amelioration of the brutal discipline in the navy. The majority of the mutineers put ashore. The Nürnberg set its course for Norway, but was surrounded by German destroyers and forced to surrender. The mutineers were savagely dealt with by court-martial.

PAGE 284.* The Vendée—a department in the North-West of France. During the French Revolution of 1789-94 the Vendée was one of the centres of a counter-revolutionary revolt on the part of the peasants in the North-Western provinces of France instigated and led by the priests. While the majority of the French peasants sided with the revolution, the peasants of the Vendée and the adjacent districts were very little influenced by the revolutionary movement from its very outset. This was due to the fact that the survivals of feudalism, towards which the peasants in other parts of France were so hostile, were much less in evidence in the Vendée. As a rule the estates of the nobility were here not very large and the class antagonism between the latter and the peasantry was not as acute as in other parts of France. The peasants of the Vendée were either small landowners or to a greater or less degree free tenants. Consequently the revolutionary measures directed towards emancipating the French peasantry from the domination of the landlords held very little meaning for the peasantry of the Vendée and the adjacent districts. On the contrary, certain of the decrees of the revolutionary government of 1793, e.g., the abolition of the general village assemblies embracing all peasant households, the division of the latter into "active" and "passive" categories, which gave a privileged position to the wealthy peasants in the management of rural affairs, caused discontent among the peasants of the Vendée and created a fertile soil for the counter-revolutionary agitation of the royalists and the priests. The peasant revolt instigated by the latter was distinguished by its extreme obstinacy, and assumed the form of a fairly protracted civil war. Since that time counter-revolutionary revolts which derive their strength from the more backward sections of the peasantry have been referred to as Vendées.

PAGE 290.* "Economic materialism" was the term which in Russian political literature of the 'nineties was used for the Marxian materialist conception of history, i.e., the history of the development of human society. Lenin applies the epithet "blackguards" who "have contemplated the posterior of economic materialism" to the bourgeois writers who mutilated Marxism in the interests of the bourgeoisie. By the intellectuals who contemplate the posterior of economic materialism he means pseudo-Marxists like the Mensheviks and the Novaya Zhizn-ists. The phrase "contemplated the posterior" was borrowed from Plekhanov, who used it at a time when he was still a revolutionary Marxist. In the preface to his Vademecum for the Editors of "Rabocheye Dyelo," written in 1900, Plekhanov says: "Our Economists [i.e., the opportunists of the 'nineties.—Ed.] contemplate the posterior of the working class," i.e., trail in the wake of the backward sections of the proletariat.

PAGE 291.* The quotation is from an editorial in Novaya Zhizn of October 14 (1), 1917, entitled "The Congress of Soviets and the Constituent Assembly," in which the Novaya Zhizn-ists, while criticising the Cadets, at the same time condemned the July demonstration and declared themselves opposed to insurrection and the transfer of power to the Soviets.

PAGE 292.* "Yes, sir, two—moderation and punctiliousness"—the words of Molchalin, a character in Griboyedov's comedy The Sorrows of Wisdom, which depicts the disintegration and demoralisation of the nobility and ruling circles at the beginning of the nineteenth century. Molchalin is a type of petty bureaucrat, a lickspittle (his maxim is: "How can one dare to have one's own opinion?") fawning on his superiors, a mean egotist perpetually engaged in petty intrigues for his own interest and advancement. Lenin frequently compared the moderation and similar virtuous characteristics of the petty-bourgeois democrats (Mensheviks, Novaya Zhizn-ists, etc.) to the characteristics of Molchalin, thereby emphasising their fear of the class struggle and their servility to the bourgeoisie.

PAGE 292. The reference is to the forged documents published during the July days of 1917 which were compiled with the knowledge of the Provisional Government and in which Lenin and the other Bolsheviks were accused of being spies and agents of the German government (see note to p. 167*).

PAGE 296.* The Smolny Institute was the headquarters of the Petrograd Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies which at that time was already under the control of the Bolsheviks.

PAGE 297.* "A Letter to the Bolshevik Comrades Attending the Regional Congress of the Soviets of the Northern Region" was written by Lenin in Petrograd on October 21 (8), 1917. It is a reiteration of Lenin's insistent appeals to the Party to proceed to the organisation of insurrection, which he began to make with his letter to the Central Committee "The Bolsheviks Must Assume Power." Unfortunately, no details are today available of the discussion of this letter by the Bolshevik fraction at the Congress of Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies of the Northern Region.

This Congress was summoned by the Regional Executive Committee of the army, navy and workers in Finland and was held in Petrograd on October 24-26 (11-13). In view of the fact that the overwhelming majority of the delegates were Bolsheviks or Left Socialist-Revolutionaries, the Menshevik-Socialist-Revolutionary Central Executive Committee declared the Congress to be "a private conference." The numerically small Menshevik fraction took no active part in the labours of the Congress and attended only for information purposes. The Congress declared in favour of the immediate transfer of power to the Soviets, the immediate proposal of peace to the peoples of the warring countries, the immediate transfer of land to the peasants and the convocation of the Constituent Assembly on the date already appointed. The Congress broadcasted a radio message announcing that a Second Congress of Soviets would be held on November 2 (October 20), the purpose of which was to secure an immediate armistice on all fronts and the transfer of all land to the peasants, and to guarantee the convocation of the Constituent Assembly. This message contained an appeal to prevent the Congress from being frustrated by the bourgeoisie and the compromisers, and called upon all the Soviets to send their representatives to the Congress.

PAGE 297. Speaking of the outburst of indignation on the part of the Czech workers, Lenin has the following incident in mind.

In the summer of 1917, owing to shortage of food and the other disasters caused by the war, a strike broke out in several of the towns of Bohemia and Moravia. The strikers originally demanded the discontinuance of food requisitions and of the withdrawal of foodstuffs for consignment to Germany and Vienna, but later they demanded the cessation of the war and the release of arrested persons. In certain localities the movement assumed the character of open mass revolutionary action. In Brünn armed fighting lasted several days. The movement was savagely repressed.

In August 1917, a strike involving over 40,000 workers broke out in Turin, Italy, provoked by the war and the food shortage. The strike was accompanied by demonstrations.

PAGE 299.* Lenin is referring to a speech delivered in the Pre-parliament (the Council of the Republic) on October 20 (7), 1917, by Breshko-Breshkovskaya, a member of the extreme Right Wing of the Socialist-Revolutionaries (see note to p. 260 *). This speech was printed in the Socialist-Revolutionary papers, including Dyelo Naroda.

PAGE 303.* This resolution of the Central Committee dealing with the subject of armed insurrection was written by Lenin. It was twice discussed at meetings of the Central Committee devoted to the question of armed insurrection. The first meeting was held on October 23 (10). It was the first time since Lenin went into hiding after the July events that he attended a meeting of the Central Committee. Besides Lenin, there were present Stalin, Sverdlov, Uritsky, Dzerzhinsky, Kollontai, Bubnov, Sokolnikov, Lomov and others. Sverdlov was in the chair. The resolution on armed insurrection proposed by Lenin was adopted by ten votes to two (Zinoviev and Kamenev). At this meeting too a resolution moved by Dzerzhinsky was adopted to "create for the purposes of political leadership in the immediate future a Political Bureau from among the members of the Central Committee."

The second meeting of the Central Committee was held on October 29 (16), 1917, jointly with representatives from the leading Party organisations. The purpose of the meeting was to obtain precise information regarding the sentiments of the workers and soldiers and to ascertain the views of the Petrograd and Moscow Party workers on the question of insurrection. Two points of view conflicted at this meeting: Lenin was in favour of an insurrection within the next few days, while Zinoviev and Kamenev were opposed to insurrection, or at least proposed to postpone the question until the Congress of Soviets. Lenin's point of view was definitely supported by the overwhelming majority of those present, including a majority of the members of the Central Committee. Stalin, Kalinin, Sverdlov, Dzerzhinsky and others spoke in favour of insurrection. After repeated objections by Kamenev and Zinoviev, the meeting by nineteen votes to two, with four abstentions, adopted the resolution proposed by Lenin, which confirmed the decision of the Central Committee of October 23 (10) and resolved to call upon all Party organisations to intensify preparations for insurrection. The resolution of October 29 (16) states:

"The meeting welcomes and wholeheartedly supports the resolution of the Central Committee, calls upon all organisations, workers and soldiers to undertake comprehensive and intensive preparations for armed insurrection and to support the central body created for this purpose by the Central Committee, and expresses its complete confidence that the Central Committee and the Soviet will in good time indicate the favourable moment and the most suitable methods of action."

At this meeting the Central Committee appointed a Military and Political Committee consisting of Sverdlov, Stalin, Bubnov, Uritsky and Dzerzhinsky.

PAGE 304.* "A Letter to the Comrades" was written by Lenin on October 29-30 (16-17) and printed in Rabochy Put of November 1, 2 and 3 (October 19, 20 and 21), 1917. It contains a severe and annihilating criticism of the position taken up by Kamenev and Zinoviev at the meetings of the Central Committee on October 23 (10) and October 29 (16), at which the question of the immediate organisation of armed insurrection was decided (cf. the resolution of the Central Committee, p. 303 in the present volume, and the note to it) and shatters their arguments step by step. This letter played an important part in mobilising the forces of the Party around the decision of the Central Committee on the question of armed insurrection and dealt a severe blow not only to the strike-breaking attitude of Zinoviev and Kamenev, but also to all vacillations that might manifest themselves in these decisive days of the October Revolution. A blow of this annihilating character was all the more necessary since Kamenev and Zinoviev did not rest content with defending their point of view at the meetings of the Central Committee. On the day following the meeting of October 23 (10), they handed in a statement to the Central Committee protesting against the latter's decision; and this statement they sent out to all the more important Party organisations. After the meeting of October 29 (16), they presented a new statement to the Central Committee, in which they demanded that a plenary meeting of the Central Committee be immediately summoned. Moreover, Kamenev presented a statement announcing his resignation from the Central Committee, in which he said:

"Since I am unable to defend the point of view expressed in the latest decisions of the Central Committee, which determined the whole character of its future work, and since I consider that this position will lead to the defeat of the Party and the proletariat, I request the Central Committee not to consider me a member of the Central Committee any longer. Kamenev."

Matters did not stop there. On October 31 (18), in the anti-Bolshevik paper Novaya Zhizn, which in its opposition to the seizure of power by the proletariat used almost the same arguments as those offered by Kamenev and Zinoviev (cf. "Can the Bolsheviks Retain State Power?" pp. 250-96 in the present volume), a public statement appeared signed by Kamenev in the name of Zinoviev and himself, which stated that "under the present circumstances" they were both obliged "to express their opposition to any attempt to assume the initiative of armed insurrection, which would be doomed to failure and would be fraught with disastrous consequences for the Party, for the proletariat and for the fate of the revolution." "To stake everything on an offensive in the next few days would be an act of desperation," Kamenev and Zinoviev went on to say. This statement, which disclosed the secret decision of the Party to undertake preparations for armed insurrection, and which, moreover, was published in a paper hostile to the seizure of power by the proletariat, amounted to a betrayal of the revolution on the part of Kamenev and Zinoviev. Lenin replied in "A Letter to the Members of the Bolshevik Party," of October 31 (18), and "A Letter to the Central Committee of the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party," of November 1 (October 19), both reproduced in this volume (pp. 325-28 and 329-33), in which he emphatically and insistently demanded the expulsion of Kamenev and Zinoviev from the Party as strike-breakers. These letters of Lenin's, together with Kamenev's statement of October 29 (16) containing his resignation from the Central Committee, were discussed at a meeting of the Central Committee held on November 2 (October 20), 1917. After prolonged discussion, the Central Committee resolved not to expel Kamenev and Zinoviev from the Party, to accept Kamenev's resignation from the Central Committee, and "to charge Kamenev and Zinoviev to make no public statements regarding the decisions of the Central Committee and the line of work it had indicated." At the same time it adopted "a proposal made by Milyutin to the effect that 'no member of the Central Committee has the right to make any utterances expressing opposition to decisions already adopted by the Central Committee.'"

With this the question of the conduct of Kamenev and Zinoviev was for the time being exhausted. But the Party and the Central Committee were to be confronted with this question once more when after the October Revolution, in connection with the organisation of a Soviet government, Kamenev and Zinoviev continued to pursue their policy of confining the revolution within bourgeois-democratic limits, in spite of the fact that power had already been seized by the proletariat. They resigned from the Central Committee, taking with them from that body and from the Council of People's Commissars several other Rights within the Party (cf. the letters of the Central Committee "To Comrades Zinoviev, Kamenev, Ryazanov and Larin" and "To All Party Members and to All the Toiling Classes of Russia," in the present volume, pp. 412 and 413-17 and the corresponding note).

PAGE 304. This "very important Bolshevik gathering in Petrograd" was the meeting of the Central Committee. Lenin's reference to a comrade who allegedly informed him of this meeting, and the statement that the meeting had been held "the previous day," i.e., October 28 (15), were actuated presumably by motives of secrecy, since the meeting was in fact held on October 29 (16) and Lenin himself was present (see the preceding note). The expression "this pretty pair of comrades" refers to Zinoviev and Kamenev, who opposed Lenin at this meeting. It is to be presumed that the formulations of the objections of these opponents of insurrection which Lenin analyses in the present article are taken from the notes made of Zinoviev's and Kamenev's speeches by Lenin himself.

PAGE 305.* The peasant movement against the landlords, who enjoyed the protection of the Provisional Government in all its successive forms up to the time of its overthrow, did not abate for a single moment during the interval between the February Revolution and the October Revolution. At times it was of a comparatively peaceful character, at others it assumed the violent form that had characterised it in 1905, when estates were wrecked and mansions burnt down, while on occasion the peasants took possession of the landlords' estates by direct seizure. It is noteworthy that the peasant movement assumed its most acute form in the period July to October, i.e., when the bourgeoisie resorted to open counter-revolutionary action, on the one hand, and when, on the other, the proletariat definitely went over to the side of the Bolshevik Party, and became particularly intense in August 1917. From that time, too, the measures taken by the Provisional Government against the peasantry increased in severity and ever more frequently assumed the form of armed repression. The counter-revolution was directed mainly against the proletariat, but it also aimed at the peasantry. In September and October the peasant movement was particularly acute in the Tambov Gubernia, especially in the Kozlov Uyezd, where the peasants burnt and wrecked scores of estates. The Provisional Government proclaimed martial law in the Tambov Gubernia and forbade assemblies of any kind. The movement spread in a no less acute form to the Ryazan Gubernia. In order to "pacify" the peasants, the Public Prosecutor, Staal, was sent from Moscow to the Ryazan and Tambov Gubernias with a body of troops, under the command of Captain Mironovich, which at the same time put down the mutiny which had broken out in the Tambov garrison.

PAGE 306.* An editorial entitled "Bread!" in the Bolshevik Rabochy Put of October 25 (12), 1917, stated:

"No other than the bourgeois paper, Russkaya Volya, recently admitted that the peasant movement in the Kozlov Uyezd has led to the unexpected result that all the railway stations in the uyezd are literally flooded with grain. This is because the landlords whose estates have still not been wrecked are hastening to save their possessions."

PAGE 315.* One of the prominent leaders in the All-Russian Union of Railwaymen (the Vikzhel) was A. A. Planson, a bourgeois lawyer and member of the Narodni-Socialist Party (which occupied a position intermediary between the Cadets and the Right Socialist-Revolutionaries) and a member of the Central Executive Committee of the Soviets. The Vikzhel was a union of all railway employees, including the office and executive staffs. Its leaders were not distinguished by any clear-cut class position, and down to the October Revolution, and for some time after, were under the influence of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks.

On the eve of the October Revolution, the political and economic life of the Railwaymen's Union and of the Postal and Telegraph Employees' Union was marked, as Lenin expressed it, "by the separation of the proletarian elements of the masses from the petty-bourgeois and bourgeois leaders." At the time of the October Revolution the mass of railway workers and employees, as of postal and telegraph workers and employees, sympathised with the Bolsheviks and were hostile to their leaders, although the latter professed to speak in the name of the masses on all official occasions.

PAGE 315. The reference is to the speech made by Sokolnikov at the meeting of the Central Committee on October 29 (16), 1917. In the minutes of the meeting it is stated that Sokolnikov in his speech "recalled the events of February, when, too, nothing had been prepared, yet the revolution was successful." To this Zinoviev objected: "This revolution has been compared with the February Revolution. That comparison is inadmissible, for at that time nobody supported the old government, whereas now the fight is against the whole bourgeois world."

PAGE 320.* During the elections to the Petrograd City Duma an "Appeal by the Editors" was printed in Novoye Vremya (New Times) of June 9 (May 27), with the caption, "Vote for the List of the People's Freedom Party" (i.e., the Cadets).

PAGE 323.* The article by V. Bazarov, entitled "The Marxist Attitude Towards Insurrection," appeared in Novaya Zhizn of October 30 (17), 1917. In this article Bazarov, without mentioning their names, speaks approvingly of the protest made by Kamenev and Zinoviev against the decision of the Central Committee.

PAGE 323. Lenin is referring to the "Unity Congress of the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party," convened in 1917 by the "Central Commission," on which were represented the Menshevik Organisation Committee, the Martov group, the Novaya Zhizn-ists, the Moscow "Unionists," the Bund and the Menshevik Caucasian Regional Organisation. The Congress took place in Petrograd on September 1-6 (August 19-24), 1917. The currents and tendencies indicated united at this Congress and elected a Central Committee.

The Bolsheviks, of course, took no part in this Congress, of which Lenin wrote that all the groups represented at it "had a common ideological foundation: a senseless, uncritical and philistine confidence in good intentions. . . . In this petty-bourgeois confidence lies the root of the evil in our revolution."

PAGE 326.* Lenin is referring to the numerous articles written by Plekhanov during the years 1906 and 1907 in the paper Tovarisch (in particular those advocating a bloc with the Cadets in the elections to the Second Duma). This paper was edited by Kuskova and Prokopovich and was a direct echo of the views of the Cadet Party.

PAGE 329.* In connection with the statements which had appeared in the bourgeois press to the effect that preparations were being made for an armed insurrection, Trotsky at the meeting of the Petrograd Soviet on October 31 (18), 1917, declared that neither the Bolsheviks nor the Petrograd Soviet were making preparations for an insurrection in the immediate future and that no armed action had been designed by them. However, they would not permit the revolutionary garrison to be withdrawn from Petrograd, and at the first attempt of the counter-revolutionaries to thwart the Congress of Soviets "the whole of revolutionary Russia will respond by a most vigorous counter-attack, which will be ruthless and which we shall fight to the bitter end." Trotsky was followed by Kamenev, who declared that he subscribed to every word of Trotsky's statement. At the meeting of the Central Committee of the Bolshevik Party held on November 2 (October 20), Trotsky explained that he was forced to make this statement owing to Kamenev's threat to move a resolution against armed action at the meeting of the Soviet.

PAGE 334.* "A Letter to the Members of the Central Committee" was written on the eve of the armed insurrection of the workers and soldiers of Petrograd. It was the last and decisive warning given by Lenin that armed action against the Provisional Government had become essential and must not be delayed. A great amount of work had already been performed by the Central Committee and the Petrograd and Moscow Committees of the Party in Petrograd, Moscow, Helsingfors, Kronstadt, and on the North-Western front, in preparing the masses of workers and soldiers, as well as the Party organisations, for armed insurrection. Contacts were being established, weapons secured and the moment for action in the various localities indicated.

Under these circumstances, and in view of the crisis, Lenin rightly considered that to delay the insurrection would be fatal.

And he was not mistaken. On the night of November 6 (October 24) the proletariat and the garrison of Petrograd, led by the Bolshevik Party, overthrew the Provisional Government.

PAGE 339.* Lenin's report on the agrarian question delivered to the April Party Conference and the resolution adopted on this report (also written by Lenin) are extremely important documents in the history of the agrarian programme of the Russian Bolshevik Party and of its tactics with regard to the peasantry. Having discussed the question of the revision of the Party programme, the April Conference of the Party decided that the changes in the agrarian programme must follow the lines of the resolution it had adopted on the agrarian question. The fundamental ideas developed by Lenin in his report and embodied in the resolution adopted by the Conference are in close harmony with the principal writings of Lenin on the question of the programme, strategy and tactics of the Party during the transition from the bourgeois revolution to the proletarian revolution—"The Tasks of the Proletariat in the Present Revolution" (the April Theses), "The Tasks of the Proletariat in Our Revolution—Draft of a Platform for the Proletarian Party" and "Letters on Tactics," all of which are reproduced in this volume. Subsequent speeches and articles made and written on the agrarian and peasant question by Lenin in 1917 give more concrete and precise form to these ideas in conformity with the changing situation.

The February Revolution failed to secure the aims pursued by the peasant war against the landlords. After the February Revolution the bourgeoisie and the petty-bourgeois parties also proved that they were incapable of securing these aims. They could be secured, as Lenin frequently asserted, only when the proletariat assumed the leadership of the peasant war against the landlords. The idea so vigorously advocated by Lenin in 1905-07, namely, the leadership, or hegemony, of the proletariat in this war, and his demand for the nationalisation of the land as a revolutionary method of settling the agrarian question, retained their force in 1917. But they were now subordinated to the principal and urgent task that faced the proletariat in 1917, the direct transition from the bourgeois revolution to the proletarian revolution. The two social wars—the war of the peasants against the landlords and the war of the proletariat against the bourgeoisie—were interwoven one with the other in 1917 as they were in 1905, but in a new way, for the immediate task in 1917 was not to consummate the peasant revolution, but to proceed to the proletarian revolution. The proletariat must lead the peasant revolution, but it must simultaneously proceed to the socialist revolution. This meant that the proletarian socialist revolution must in its course secure the aims of the peasant revolution, but must subordinate that revolution to its own purposes. Accordingly, the leadership by the proletariat of the peasant war against the landlords had to be so directed as immediately to secure the support of the agricultural labourers and the poor peasants for the proletarian revolution against the bourgeoisie (including also the rural bourgeoisie) and, at the same time, by abolishing the rule of the landlords in the countryside, gain for the proletariat and its party the sympathies of the middle peasants, neutralise the latter in their attitude towards the proletarian revolution, and make this revolution the basis for an alliance with the middle peasants in the future. The agrarian programme had to be such that its realisation should serve the purposes above indicated and create the basis for the future socialist transformation of agriculture.

This formed the basis of the agrarian points of the "Draft Platform for the Proletarian Party" which Lenin drew up for the April Party Conference (pp. 45-76 in this volume), of the resolution on the agrarian and peasant question drafted by him for this Conference, and of his speech on this subject delivered at the Conference.

It is important to note the significance Lenin attached to the necessity of winning over the agricultural workers to the side of the industrial proletariat. While we find that Trotsky in 1917, republishing in pamphlet form a revised edition of his article "A Programme of Peace," prophesies, in accordance with his theory of "permanent revolution," that the proletarian revolution in Russia would collapse if the proletariat did not succeed in Western Europe, Lenin, on the contrary, in his resolution on the agrarian and peasant question submitted to the April Conference, declares that it would depend upon whether the urban proletariat succeeded in securing the following of the rural proletariat and the poor peasants "as to how the fate and issue of the Russian revolution would be determined, if the incipient proletarian revolution in Europe did not exercise a direct and powerful influence on our country."

PAGE 339. Lenin at that time already discerned that the tide of the peasant movement for land was rising. And in fact we find that in March 1917 the agrarian movement had begun to develop and had already affected thirty-four uyezds. It grew rapidly in April, when it spread to 174 uyezds. Moreover, the movement had grown more organised. In their resolutions passed during the early stages of the revolution the peasants had expressed their confidence in the government, and when they took land they did so without declaring open war on the landlords. The form these seizures usually took was that the landlords were forbidden to plough, sow, or reap. Meadows were seized in the same way, the landlords being forbidden to cut or dispose of the hay. The seizure of farm implements was made under the guise of "purchases" at extremely low prices, the landlords at the same time being forbidden to buy or sell farm implements. Reduction of rents on land by decision of the peasants' assemblies, arbitrary refusals to pay rent, and decisions to the effect that rent shall be paid not to the landlord, but to the peasant committees or into the state treasury, must also be regarded as peaceful manifestations of the peasant movement. But by March 1917 we find that one-quarter of the agrarian incidents were cases in which landlords' farms were wrecked or burnt down.

PAGE 339. Lenin gives an exhaustive criticism of the Menshevik programme adopted at the Stockholm Congress of the R.S.D.L.P. in 1906 and equally exhaustive arguments in favour of the nationalisation of the land in the bourgeois-democratic revolution in his book The Agrarian Programme of Social-Democracy in the First Russian Revolution, 1905-07. This book was written in 1907 and published in 1908, but was confiscated by the tsarist government and burnt. It was again published only in 1917. All the chapters of this book except the fifth are reproduced in various volumes of the Selected Works: Chaps. I, II and IV will be found in Vol. III, Chap. III in Vol. XII, while the Postscript, written in 1917, is reproduced in the present volume, pp. 389-90.

PAGE 340.* The bill to which Lenin here refers was introduced by 104 Trudoviki in the First State Duma in June 1906, and again, with slight amendments, by 99 Trudoviki in the Second State Duma in 1907. The main proposals of this bill were as follows: the land was to belong to the people, and therefore all state, appanage, tsar's and monastery lands (see note to p. 346 ), as well as the landed estates and other private lands which exceeded an established labour standard, were to pass into a national land fund. Communal and privately owned lands not exceeding the established labour standard were to remain in the possession of their owners, but the accumulation of land exceeding the established standard in the hands of a single owner was to be forbidden. The cession to the national fund of land exceeding the labour standard was to be compensated on a scale to be determined by the people themselves. The Bill of the 104 provided for the establishment of local committees, elected by universal suffrage, for the purpose of carrying out these reforms.

PAGE 340. The reference is to Lenin's book, The Agrarian Programme of Social-Democracy in the First Russian Revolution, 1905-07 (cf. note to p. 339 ), in Chap. I of which Lenin gives an analysis of the Bill of the 104 and also indicates the nature of the signatories to the bill.

PAGE 342.* The Mensheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionaries betrayed complete unanimity in the matter of referring the settlement of the land question to the Constituent Assembly. At the All-Russian Conference of Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies held on April 10-16 (March 29-April 3), 1917, i.e., one and a half months after the February Revolution, a resolution was adopted which embodied a united platform of the Mensheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionaries on the agrarian and peasant question. This platform recognised the necessity of "radically" reforming agrarian relationships, but this was to be done only by the Constituent Assembly, in which, it was promised, support would be given to the demand for the alienation without compensation of all privately owned lands and their transfer to the toiling people, with the exception of lands not exceeding a standard to be established in each region by local democratic committees. Since the settlement of the land question was being deferred till the Constituent Assembly, the resolution contained an undertaking to resist all attempts at arbitrary solution of the land problem made in the localities, and seizure of land by the peasants was characterised as counter-revolutionary.

As to immediate and practical proposals, the Conference of Soviets did not go beyond the measures taken by the bourgeois-landlord Provisional Government. The platform approved the confiscation of the lands belonging to the Romanov family which had already been effected by the Provisional Government. It also approved the establishment of local Land Committees, in which the landlords and peasants were to arrive at peaceful agreements regarding the reduction of land rents, were to regulate wage scales and were to examine all disputes and differences arising between landlords and peasants over the land.

PAGE 343.* The prescriptions of Shingarev and the Cadets—i.e., the land policy of the Provisional Government. Shingarev, a Cadet, while Minister for Agriculture in the first Provisional Government pursued a policy which was dictated by the Central Committee of the Cadet Party. The principal aim of the Provisional Government was to defer the settlement of the land question until the Constituent Assembly met, and meanwhile to organise the forces that would resist a revolutionary solution of the peasant problem. While not passing a single agrarian law, the Provisional Government, on March 22 (9), resolved on the institution of criminal proceedings against all participants in agrarian acts aiming at the abolition of the landed estates. On March 30 (17), the Provisional Government issued a manifesto on the land question, in which it again threatened to take measures against seizures of land and declared that "the land question must be settled by a law adopted by the representatives of the people" and that the Provisional Government would draft a new land law for submission to the Constituent Assembly.

Apart from combating the peasant movement, the practical actions taken by the Provisional Government were as follows: on March 25 (12), the tsar's lands were confiscated (see note to p. 346 ); on March 29 (16) the appanages were placed under the charge of the Minister for Agriculture; on May 4 (April 21) a Chief Land Committee and local Land Committees were set up and charged with the task of preparing the land law and of settling "disputes" between the landlords and the peasants. The landlords were guaranteed more than half the seats on these Committees, which were to act on the basis of pre-revolutionary laws. The Provisional Government was incapable of taking any effective measures on the land question, not to speak of the confiscation and nationalisation of the landed estates, since, firstly, this would be a blow at private property and would facilitate the development of the proletarian revolution, and, secondly, it would seriously affect the direct property interests of large sections of the bourgeoisie, for example, it would affect the financial bourgeoisie through the banks, in which the landed estates were mortgaged, and such bourgeois as conducted agricultural enterprises on capitalist lines on their own lands (as well as the landlords who had become bourgeois, who formed a large section of the leaders of the Cadet Party).

PAGE 346.* The Stolypin agrarian reform consisted of a number of laws issued by the tsarist government in the period 1906-11 (in particular, the laws of November 22 [9], 1906, and June 27 [14], 1910). These laws aimed at developing and strengthening the rural bourgeoisie, the kulaks, to serve as a bulwark for the tsarist autocracy against revolution. The laws sanctioned and encouraged withdrawal from the village communes and the transformation of allotments from the communal land into private property, as well as the purchase and sale of such land. The significance of the Stolypin agrarian legislation, and its practical consequences, which are touched on here in the resolution of the April Party Conference, are dealt with in detail in "The Question of the (General) Agrarian Policy of the Present Government" and "The Agrarian Question and the Present State of Russia" (Lenin, Selected Works, Vol. IV).

PAGE 316. Appanages were lands belonging to members of the reigning family, the Romanovs. They comprised over 20,000,000 acres. Arable land was leased to the peasants, while the forests were exploited by a special government department for the administration of appanages. The church lands comprised the livings of the clergy, and before the revolution, together with the monastery lands, amounted to about 5,500,000 acres. The tsar's lands were the personal property of the largest landlord in Russia, Tsar Nicholas Romanov, who owned 110,000,000-115,000,000 acres.

PAGE 348.* Independent Soviets of Agricultural Workers' Deputies and Soviets of the semi-proletarian peasantry were not very numerous prior to the October Revolution. According to available information, Soviets of Agricultural Workers' Deputies were to be found in the Vitebsk Gubernia and on certain of the landed estates in the Ukraine (particularly in the Kherson Gubernia). Soviets of Landless Deputies were fairly widespread in Esthonia, and in the autumn of 1917 represented a large organisation embracing nearly 40,000 agricultural workers and landless peasants. An Executive Committee elected at a conference held in Reval on August 26-29 (13-16) proclaimed itself the Soviet of the Landless Peasants of Esthonia. It was not until after the October Revolution that independent organisations of poor peasants began to be formed all over Russia. By a decree of the Soviet government they were transformed into Committees of Poor Peasants. With the support of these Committees of Poor Peasants the proletariat brought about the socialist revolution in the countryside.

PAGE 349.* The First All-Russian Congress of Peasants' Deputies, for which the present "Draft Resolution on the Agrarian Question" was prepared by Lenin, and at which he delivered his "Speech on the Agrarian Question," (pp. 352-71 in the present volume), was held in Petrograd on May 17-June 10 (May 4-28), 1917. The Congress was preceded by a conference of representatives of peasant organisations from twenty-seven gubernias, which was held in Petrograd on April 25-30 (12-17), and at which a bureau was set up for the purpose of convening the Congress. All the preparations for the Congress, and the Congress itself, were directed by the Socialist-Revolutionaries, who at the Congress proved to be in an overwhelming majority. The Bolsheviks were supported by a small group of non-partisan peasants. Lenin was appointed by the Bolshevik Central Committee to represent the Party at the Congress, but owing to illness he was unable to attend and speak until the discussion on the agrarian question was in progress. On May 20 (7), prior to his appearance, Lenin sent a written message of greeting to the Congress, in which he dwelt on the principal differences dividing the Bolshevik Party and the Menshevik and Socialist-Revolutionary parties. Prior to Lenin's speech, the Congress, by an overwhelming majority and with only sixteen dissentients and fourteen abstentions, had already adopted a resolution defining its attitude towards the Provisional Government, in which it declared its wholehearted support of the bourgeois Provisional Government and welcomed the fact that the "Socialists" had joined the coalition government (see note to p. 136 *).

The "Draft Resolution on the Agrarian Question," written by Lenin and moved by him at the Congress, and his speech, form a popular explanation of the decisions of the April Conference of the Party on this question. Lenin's speech produced a great stir at the Congress. According to the report of the Socialist-Revolutionary paper Dyelo Naroda, certain passages of Lenin's speech provoked cries of approval and applause from a section of the Congress. It was only with great difficulty that the chairman was able after this speech to restore the agitated audience to silence and to allow the floor to the next speaker. But the majority of the Congress consisted of "solid," wealthy peasants and Socialist-Revolutionary intellectuals, so that the resolution of the Socialist-Revolutionaries on the agrarian question was adopted. In this resolution it was stated that "the All-Russian Soviet of Peasants' Deputies expects that the Provisional Government will, within the limits of its competence, do everything to foster the free expression of the will of the toiling people in the matter of preparing for and realising the great agrarian reform with which Russia is faced, and will frustrate every attempt to hinder this cause on the part of interested persons who place their personal and group interests higher than the interests of the people." The whole resolution teems with references to "the interests of the people." But the only practical measures it proposed were contained in one point advocating the prohibition of the sale of land until the convocation of the Constituent Assembly. This prohibition, however, was never put into effect by the Provisional Government, in spite of the fact that the Socialist-Revolutionary Chernov had become Minister for Agriculture at the time the Congress met (see note to p. 377 *).

PAGE 352.* On June 1 (May 19), 1917, at a meeting of the Chief Land Committee set up by the Provisional Government to draft a land law, Smilga proposed on behalf of the Bolsheviks that the land should be transferred to the peasants immediately. This proposal was rejected by the Socialist-Revolutionary-Menshevik majority of the Committee, and instead the following declaration on the land question, dated June 2 (May 20), was adopted:

"... The idea which must form the basis of the future agrarian reform is that all land of agricultural value must be placed at the disposal of the toiling agricultural population. ... No settlement of the land question shall be adopted, let alone be put into effect, until the convocation of the Constituent Assembly. ... Arbitrary attempts to satisfy the land requirements of the population by means of the seizure of the land of others represent a serious danger to the state and instead of leading to the desired settlement of the land question will create a multiplicity of new problems which will be capable of solution only at the cost of severe perturbation of the life of the nation. ..."

The declaration recommended the setting up of local Land Committees to make the best possible preparations for the land reform, "the functions of which [i.e., the Land Committees.—Ed.] shall not go beyond the bounds of the law."

PAGE 354.* The resolution adopted by a private conference of members of the State Duma on June 2 (May 20), 1917, read as follows:

"This private conference of the members of the State Duma, having heard the report of the member of the State Duma S. I. Shidlovsky on the commencement of the labours of the Chief Land Committee, as well as the draft resolution proposed at the first meeting of the latter, declares that the land reform must be carried out only by the Constituent Assembly, since only the Constituent Assembly will be a body sufficiently authoritative to guarantee that its decisions will be unreservedly and universally accepted. Any attempt, no matter on whose part, to usurp the rights of the Constituent Assembly in this question will provoke disorder in the country. Any attempt to accomplish the agrarian reform by means of arbitrary or violent seizure will lead to endless disputes and misunderstandings, and even to civil disturbances. The result of such disorders will be a considerable harvest shortage and even famine. In these difficult times, when it is essential that work in the sphere of agriculture shall proceed without disturbance in order that the needs of the army may be satisfied and the population supplied with food, the State Duma calls upon all members of the rural population to refrain from all violent action until such time as the Constituent Assembly makes its decision."

PAGE 363.* Lenin is referring to the resolution on the agrarian question adopted by the Peasant Congress of the Penza Gubernia, held on April 20-23 (7-10), 1917. The Congress adopted Instructions to the Provisional Government, proposing that all monastery, church, appanage and tsar's lands (see note to p. 346 ), as well as privately owned lands, be declared the property of the whole nation without compensation, that private property in land be abolished in perpetuity and that the land be held in tenure by the toilers. The Penza Congress was one of the first of the more revolutionary peasant congresses to propose palliative measures to be put into effect by the Provisional Government. For instance, the Congress resolved that rent for land should be paid to the landlords only to the amount of the taxes levied on the land. It also passed a resolution to the effect that available stocks of seed in the volost, including the stocks of the landlords, should be distributed by the volost Committees. Pastures and meadow lands belonging to the landlords were also to be used in accordance with the decisions of the volost Committees. The volost Committees were particularly charged to see to it that the forests, orchards and structures of the landlords be protected from pillage and damage, since they were to become national property.

PAGE 370.* Lenin is referring to the Civil War between the Northern and Southern states of America. This war was due to profound economic causes. The Northern states, where industry was chiefly developed, could not reconcile themselves to the hindrance to free capitalist development represented by the existence of slavery in the South. Civil war broke out, and, although success was at first on the side of the South, the Northern states were backed by the advantages of industrial capitalism and finally defeated the South. On February 1, 1865, the United States Congress "emancipated" the Negroes and abolished slavery.

PAGE 372.* As will be seen from its first lines, the article "On the Necessity of Founding an Agricultural Workers' Union in Russia" was written in connection with the All-Russian Conference of Trade Unions (see note to p. 372 ) and was printed in Pravda of July 7 and 8 (June 24 and 25), 1917. The article develops one of Lenin's basic ideas regarding the duties of the proletariat and the proletarian party in preparing for the transition to the proletarian revolution, namely, the formation of an independent class organisation of agricultural workers. Like the Soviets of Agricultural Workers' Deputies and the Soviets of Poor Peasants' Deputies, to which Lenin repeatedly refers in his writings in 1917, the Agricultural Workers' Union was to serve as a transmission belt between the Party and the mass of both the agricultural workers and the poor peasants, since the success of the revolution, as the resolution of the April Party Conference declared, depended on securing for the proletariat the support of these masses.

PAGE 372. The All-Russian Conference of Trade Unions was held in Petrograd on July 4-11 (June 21-28), 1917. The Conference was attended by 211 delegates, the overwhelming majority of whom represented central and local trades councils. The assignment of the number of delegates was not based upon any system of proportionate representation. For instance, the Kiev Central Trades Council, which represented 70,000 workers, and the Tula Central Trades Council, which represented 25,000 members, each sent two delegates. The representation was somewhat increased for the trade unions of the capitals. Thus, the Central Trades Councils of Petrograd and Moscow sent five delegates each (the Petrograd Trades Council embraced 250,000 members and the Moscow Trades Council 150,000 members).

Fifty central trades councils, embracing 364 trade unions with a total of 1,230,000 members, were represented at the Conference. Furthermore, individual trade unions with a total membership of 170,000 were also represented. According to the report of the Mandate Commission, the Conference was attended by seventy-three Bolsheviks, thirty-six Mensheviks, six Menshevik-Internationalists, eleven Bundists, thirty-one "non-factional" Social-Democrats, twenty-five Socialist-Revolutionaries and seventeen delegates not belonging to any political party. From the very outset the Conference was sharply divided into two camps: the Bolsheviks together with a number of the "non-factional" internationalists, on the one hand, and, on the other, a bloc of the Mensheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionaries representing themselves as advocates of "trade union unity." The first group consisted of about eighty-five delegates, including seven "non-factional" internationalists, while the remaining delegates formed the second group. In spite of their pretence to being champions of trade union unity, the second group pursued a deliberately factional, anti-Bolshevik policy. The resolutions of the Menshevik defencists were adopted by majorities of ten to twelve, the issue being decided by the vote of non-Social-Democrats. The defencist majority at the Conference was a purely formal one, since the majority of the delegates from the working class regions (Petrograd, Moscow, Ivanovo-Voznesensk, Kiev, the Urals, etc.) were Bolsheviks. The Menshevik majority at the Conference took advantage of the fact that the representative of the Bolshevik fraction who was to report on "The Party and the Trade Union Movement" was unable to appear at the Conference at the date appointed, and had the report removed from the agenda. It even prevented the announcement from the tribune of the Conference of the resolution proposed by the Bolshevik fraction, attaching it as material to the decisions of the Conference.

The principal question discussed at the Conference concerned the tasks of the trade union movement, the report on which was delivered by Grinevich on behalf of the Mensheviks and by V. P. Milyutin on behalf of the Bolsheviks. After a long discussion on these reports, the Menshevik-Socialist-Revolutionary majority succeeded in carrying a resolution in opposition to the Bolsheviks and the "non-factional" internationalists. This resolution was a defencist resolution: it advocated civil peace with the bourgeoisie, support of the imperialist war and "the neutrality of the trade unions" in the party struggle. The Conference also discussed the questions of an eight-hour day, the economic struggle, and the summoning of an All-Russian Trade Union Congress.

PAGE 377.* The article "How the Peasants Were Deceived—and Why," printed in Pravda of July 14 (1), 1917, was written in connection with the demand of the peasants that the sale and purchase of land be prohibited. Uyezd and gubernia peasants' congresses insistently demanded that the Provisional Government should immediately pass a law to this effect. The demand was endorsed by the First All-Russian Congress of Soviets of Peasants' Deputies in its resolution on the agrarian question. Acting under pressure from below, Pereverzev, the Minister for Justice in the Provisional Government, on May 30 (17) telegraphed instructions to all senior public notaries suspending transactions in land (purchase, sale and mortgage), pending the receipt of more definite instructions. A week later, on June 7 (May 25), however, Pereverzev revoked this telegram. The All-Russian Congress of Soviets of Peasants' Deputies, which was in session at the time, discussed this question at the instance of the Bolshevik fraction, and was promised by the Provisional Government that a law would be enacted prohibiting transactions in land. It was not until a month later, however, that the newspapers announced the fact that Chernov, the Minister for Agriculture, had introduced a bill prohibiting transactions in land. This bill was in fact introduced in the Provisional Government on July 6 (June 23) in the course of a report by the Minister for Agriculture on the general policy of his department. The underlying thought in this report was that it had become essential to pass a series of laws in order to pacify the peasants, while leaving the settlement of all fundamental agrarian questions to the Constituent Assembly. Accordingly, the Department of Agriculture, in the person of Chernov, presented ten bills for the consideration of the Provisional Government, among them a bill for the prohibition of the purchase, sale and mortgage of land. The Provisional Government took no decision on Chernov's report, deferring the debates to its next session. But when it became evident that the bourgeoisie and the landlords were irreconcilably hostile to the passage of a law forbidding the sale and purchase of land, the debates on the bill were entirely suspended. Chernov was obliged to resign and was succeeded as Minister for Agriculture by Maslov, a Socialist-Revolutionary who was even more Right than Chernov.

PAGE 377. On July 12 (June 29) the Petrograd papers published a report of a private conference of members of the State Duma which had taken place the previous day in the Taurida Palace. This is the conference to which Lenin is referring when he speaks of the "invisible hand" controlling the coalition Provisional Government. The conference heard a report by A. A. Bublikov on the economic situation in the country. This was followed by a report by N. N. Lvov on the situation in the rural districts, which, according to Lvov, were in a state of anarchy.

"This anarchy," Lvov said, "must be laid at the door of the government, which has permitted party organisations to interfere in an important matter of administration. . . . And the monstrosities that are taking place are not due to the state of mind of the people, but to the fact that the masses have been thrown on the mercy of chance and on the mercy of individuals who are for the most part irresponsible demagogues. These arbitrary acts are stirring up enmity between property owners of all categories, including the smallest, and the poor peasants. . . . The government must put a stop to this enmity, and in order to do so it must emerge from its state of paralysis."

Shidlovsky and Kuzmin took part in the debate, which was wound up by Rodzyanko, who proposed that pressure be brought to bear upon the Provisional Government in order to prevent all further talk of prohibiting transactions in land.

PAGE 380.* The article "Peasants and Workers" appeared on September 11 (August 29), 1917, in the Bolshevik paper Rabochy, at that time replacing Pravda, which had been closed down by the government. The article analyses the demands of the peasants on the land question in 1917 and is based on the view that these demands cannot be satisfied under a bourgeois government supported by the petty-bourgeois parties.

The Model Instructions examined by Lenin in this article were compiled by the Socialist-Revolutionaries from 242 Instructions brought from the localities by the deputies to the First All-Russian Congress of Soviets of Peasants' Deputies (see note to p. 349 *). The Model Instructions were divided into eight parts: 1) general political demands; 2) the land question; 3) transitional measures; 4) the Zemstvos; 5) the Land Committees; 6) economic measures; 7) the food question; and 8) the war. In the general political section, the Instructions demanded: a democratic republic with wide regional autonomy; a legislative body consisting of a single chamber of popular representatives elected by universal suffrage; freedom of conscience, speech, the press, assembly, association, strike and inviolability of person and domicile; the abolition of the standing army upon the conclusion of the war and its replacement by a national militia.

In the section dealing with the land, the Instructions demanded: 1) that private property in land be abolished in perpetuity; 2) that all land, including land belonging to the peasants, become the property of the people; 3) that all highly-cultivated lands be exploited by the state; 4) that hired labour be prohibited; 5) that the land be available to all citizens of the republic, provided they worked it themselves with their own labour power; 6) that land tenure be placed on an equality basis.

As transitional measures to this agrarian reform, the Instructions proposed the following: 1) that a law be immediately issued prohibiting all transactions in land, such as purchase, sale, mortgage, exchange, gift, etc.; 2) that all transactions in land effected since the February Revolution be immediately declared void; 3) that the tsarist laws sanctioning withdrawal from the commune, the transformation of communal land into private property, etc., be immediately annulled; 4) that all changing, demarcation, etc., of boundaries be suspended until the land question is settled by the Constituent Assembly; 5) that a law be immediately issued forbidding owners of forests to engage in wholesale or excessive felling of timber except with the sanction of the government and in cases of public necessity.

In spite of the revolutionary nature of the demands on the land question, the Instructions took up a defensist position in relation to the war, favouring national defence and the strengthening of the army.

The attitude of the Socialist-Revolutionaries towards the Peasants' Instructions was revealed by the fact that they were in no hurry to collate them and publish them. Five months elapsed before they were published, and it is characteristic that on the day of their publication the Izvestiya of the All-Russian Soviet of Peasants' Deputies devoted its editorial article not to the peasants' demands, but to a church congress.

As a matter of fact, by the time the Socialist-Revolutionaries came to publish the compilation of the Instructions, the mood of the peasants had grown still more revolutionary. The defencist and patriotic sentiments they had cherished at the time when they still trusted the Provisional Government and the Socialist-Revolutionaries had to a large extent abated. The peasant war against the landlords had begun. Nevertheless, these Instructions, drawn up at the time when the confidence of the peasants in the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the bourgeois Provisional Government was at its height, merely showed that the fundamental agrarian interests of the overwhelming majority of the peasants could not be satisfied under the rule of the bourgeoisie. This led to the betrayal by the Socialist-Revolutionary Party of its own agrarian programme (see note to p. 391 ), in which, as in the peasants' Instructions, the transformation of all land into public property and equality of land tenure were advocated. The Socialist-Revolutionary Party in practice became the direct defender of the interests of the kulaks, or the rural capitalist elements. It thereby prepared its own downfall. The divergence between the interests of the overwhelming majority of the peasants and the policy of the Socialist-Revolutionary Party led to the formation of a Left Wing within the latter, which ended finally in a split within the ranks of the party and the creation of a new party—the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries (see note to p. 241 *).

In view of these facts, Lenin proposes that the Bolshevik Party should expose the true character of the Socialist-Revolutionaries in a new way, by laying emphasis on the betrayal by the Socialist-Revolutionaries (except the Lefts) of the interests of the peasantry. By such an exposure of the Socialist-Revolutionary leaders, the peasant masses, and particularly the poor peasants, were to be induced to break with their Socialist-Revolutionary leaders, and to be brought under the leadership of the proletariat and its Party. The poor peasants, who formed the majority of the rural population, were at all costs to be won over to the proletariat and be got to help the latter to win political power. If that power were won, the satisfaction of the demands contained in the Instructions would be easy of fulfilment. In conclusion, Lenin, calling upon the peasants to ally themselves with the proletariat which was marching to power, speaks of the possibility of concessions being made to the peasants by the proletariat and its Party. After the October Revolution these concessions were in fact embodied in the Decree on the Land, which put into effect the agrarian demands of the peasantry as expressed in the 242 peasants' Instructions, including equal division and equal land tenure. This was a temporary departure from the Bolshevik agrarian programme, but here, as in his speech on the Decree on the Land made at the time of the October Revolution (pp. 406-09 in the present volume), Lenin advocates the necessity for such concessions, on the grounds that they would achieve the main thing, viz., the confiscation of the landed estates and the destruction of the power of the landlords, and at the same time undermine the power of the capitalists. Everything else would follow of itself; it would be suggested to the peasants by their own experience and practice.

PAGE 380. The Izvestiya of the All-Russian Soviet of Peasants' Deputies was a daily newspaper the first number of which appeared on May 22 (9), 1917. Like the Soviet itself, it was controlled by the Socialist-Revolutionaries. The paper ceased publication after the October Revolution.

PAGE 381.* Apparently, when Lenin wrote this article he had at his disposal (he was at that time living in concealment in Finland) only No. 88 of the Izvestiya of the All-Russian Soviet of Peasants' Deputies, which contained only two of the eight sections of the Model Instructions. The remaining sections, including the one dealing with the war, appeared in No. 89 of the Izvestiya.

PAGE 383.* Struvism—after P. B. Struve, who in the 'nineties regarded himself as a Marxist and belonged to the Social-Democrats. Some years later he became a liberal, and at the end of 1905 joined the Cadet Party. From that time until the October Revolution he was a member of every Central Committee of the Cadet Party and one of the leaders of the Right Wing. After the revolution he emigrated and became an avowed counter-revolutionary monarchist. While a Social-Democrat in the 'nineties, he was one of the most prominent figures in what was known as legal Marxism, which consisted of individuals who, while pretending to be Marxists, distorted Marxism in the interests of Russian capitalism, which was then in full flower. Struve wrote a book entitled Critical Remarks on the Question of the Economic Development of Russia, in which he criticised the views of the Narodniki on Russian capitalism. He argued that capitalism as compared with feudalism and the survivals of feudalism in Russian economic life was a progressive force. But he said nothing of the capitalist slavery which is inherent in the capitalist system; he said nothing of the class antagonisms and the class struggle in capitalist society; he denied the inevitability of and necessity for the collapse of capitalism and for the proletarian revolution, and, far from advocating class war against the bourgeoisie, he recommended "serving apprenticeship to capitalism." Hence, although he called himself a Marxist, Struve expunged everything that was revolutionary from Marxism and endeavoured to make it serve for the extolment and defence of capitalism. While flourishing the flag of Marxism, he served the bourgeoisie; and when the bourgeoisie began to organise itself politically, he flung that flag aside and step by step became transformed into an open enemy of the proletariat. In the same way, Russian Menshevism from its very inception flourished the flag of Marxism, but in practice advocated the subordination of the working class movement to the interests of the bourgeoisie and the bourgeois-democratic revolution. In this sense Menshevism was the successor of the Struvism of the 'nineties. This policy of the Mensheviks placed them in 1917 on the other side of the barricade—on the side of the bourgeoisie and the bourgeois counter-revolution as the enemies of the revolutionary proletariat. Both in the bourgeois-democratic revolution and in the bourgeois counter-revolution the Mensheviks trailed in the wake of the bourgeoisie, for they were armed with Struvism and not with Marxism.

The reader will find the question of Struvism dealt with in greater detail in an excerpt from Lenin's book, The Economic Content of Narodism and the Criticism of It in Mr. Struve's Book, which is reproduced in Lenin, Selected Works, Vol. I.

PAGE 385.* Regarding the struggle fought by Lenin and the Party against the Socialist-Revolutionaries during this period, cf. Lenin's articles "Why the Social-Democrats Must Declare Determined and Relentless War on the Socialist-Revolutionaries" (Selected Works, Vol. II), "Vulgar Socialism and Narodism Revived by the Socialist-Revolutionaries" (ibid.), and "Petty-Bourgeois and Proletarian Socialism" (Selected Works, Vol. III). Information on the Socialist-Revolutionaries will be found in the explanatory notes to the above articles.

PAGE 387.* Lenin is referring to Engels' "Peasant Question in France and Germany," which first appeared in the German Social-Democratic journal, Neue Zeit, No. 10, 1894. In this article Engels says;

"Firstly, the following postulate of the French programme is undoubtedly correct: we foresee the inevitable ruin of the small peasant, but we are not called upon to hasten it by our interference. Secondly, it is equally obvious that when we secure possession of the power of the state we shall not think of forcibly expropriating the small peasants (either with or without compensation), as we shall be obliged to do in the case of the large landowners. Our purpose with regard to the small peasants must be primarily to transform their private production and private property into co-operative production and co-operative property, not however by force, but by dint of example and by offering public assistance for the achievement of this end."

These postulates of Engels' are in complete harmony with the ideas of Marx. Lenin subsequently used them as the basis on which he elaborated his co-operative plan for the transformation under the dictatorship of the proletariat of the small and disunited peasant enterprises into collective and socialised enterprises.

PAGE 389.* The Postscript to the book The Agrarian Programme of Social-Democracy in the First Russian Revolution, 1905-07 (Selected Works, Vol. III) was written by Lenin in September 1917. The Postscript briefly explains those new features of the agrarian problem and its solution that distinguished 1917 from 1905-07. It sums up all that Lenin said and wrote on this question in 1917, in particular in the speeches and articles contained in Part IV of this volume. It is important to observe that the significance of the agrarian programme and the tactics towards the peasantry which Lenin advocated in 1917 is here emphasised from the point of view of the transition to the proletarian revolution as a step towards socialism, and not as the "last word" of the bourgeois revolution.

PAGE 391.* The article "A New Fraud Practised on the Peasants by the Socialist-Revolutionary Party" was printed in Rabochy Put of November 6 (October 24), 1917, i.e., on the eve of the October Revolution. This "new fraud practised on the peasants" by the new agrarian bill of the Socialist-Revolutionary Minister for Agriculture, S. Maslov, and the clamorous agitation carried on in its favour in the Socialist-Revolutionary paper, Dyelo Naroda, was the last attempt on the part of the Socialist-Revolutionaries before the October Revolution to divert the peasant masses from the revolutionary solution of the agrarian problem by advocating agreement with the landlords. Similarly, Lenin's reply to this fraud was the last occasion before the revolution on which he exposed the betrayal of the peasant masses by the Socialist-Revolutionaries. Lenin, as may be seen from his previous article, "How the Peasants Were Deceived—and Why," attached great significance to this exposure of the Socialist-Revolutionaries, as one of the means of winning over the peasantry, and particularly the poor peasantry, which was essential if the proletarian revolution was to be lasting. Shortly after the revolution, Lenin republished the article "A New Fraud Practised on the Peasants by the Socialist-Revolutionary Party" in the form of a pamphlet entitled How the Socialist-Revolutionaries Deceived the People and What the New Bolshevik Government Gave the People. In this pamphlet Lenin reprinted Maslov's bill, and contrasted it with the Decree on the Land adopted by the Second Congress of Soviets immediately after the October Revolution (pp. 406-09 in the present volume). The pamphlet was provided with a preface by Lenin, which concluded with the following words:

"Comrades peasants, seek the truth regarding the various parties, and you will find it. Collect and compare yourselves the bills of the various parties on the land question. Carefully read the land bill of the Socialist-Revolutionary minister and the law passed by the present Bolshevik government, which derives its authority from the Second All-Russian Congress of Soviets. We do not for a moment doubt what the final opinion of the peasants will be."

The subsequent development of the proletarian revolution and the present widespread collectivisation of the countryside have shown what the final opinion of the peasant masses was and how right that opinion proved to be.

PAGE 391. Lenin is referring to the betrayal by the Socialist-Revolutionaries of the following decisions of their own congresses:

1) The programme adopted by the First Congress of the Socialist-Revolutionary Party in 1905 dealt with the agrarian question in the following terms:

"In accordance with its general views regarding the aims of the revolution in the countryside, the party stands for the socialisation of the land, i.e., the withdrawal of the land from the sphere of commercial transactions and its transformation from the private property of individuals or groups into the property of the whole people on the following basis: all land shall be placed under the control of central and local popular government bodies, from democratically organised rural and urban communities to regional and central institutions (to deal with migration, settlement, administration of the land fund, etc.); tenure of the land shall be based on an equal labour standard, i.e., sufficient to satisfy an established standard of consumption by the application of the labour of the landholders themselves, whether individually or co-operatively; rent shall be paid in the form of a tax, the proceeds of which shall be used in the interests of the public; lands not of specifically local importance (large forests, fisheries, etc.), shall be administered by correspondingly broader local government bodies; mineral wealth shall be the property of the state; the land shall become national property without compensation; sufferers from this revolution in property relations shall be entitled to public support only for a period of time necessary for their personal adaptation to the new conditions of life."

2) The Second Congress of the Socialist-Revolutionary Party, held in 1917, adopted the following resolution on the agrarian question:

"In accordance with its conviction that all property in land must be abolished and that the land must become national property without compensation, to be held in tenure on the basis of an equal labour standard, the Second Congress of the Socialist-Revolutionary Party considers that the fundamental law on the land, which will establish these principles in perpetuity, must be promulgated by a national Constituent Assembly.

"While denouncing all private seizures of land, the Congress at the same time considers it essential in the interests of the toiling people and of the cause of the revolution that an agrarian policy directed towards the socialisation of the land shall be immediately and systematically carried into effect."

PAGE 396.* Lenin compares Maslov's bill to the series of reform measures by which the British government at the end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth centuries endeavoured to stem the agrarian revolution in Ireland. The Irish had been dispossessed of their land by the English at the time of the conquest of Ireland. The majority of the population consisted of small, landless peasants, occupying tiny holdings leased from the landlords at exorbitant rentals, leading a life of wretched penury and semi-starvation and, moreover, perpetually menaced by eviction owing to the tendency to consolidate the small holdings into large farms.

The profound agrarian unrest among the tenant holders at last induced the British government to pass the Land Act of 1881. This act set up tribunals for the whole of Ireland, such as already existed in Ulster, with powers to fix rent and to prevent evictions for a specified number of years. The interests of the landlords were naturally sufficiently protected in these tribunals, and the act, while offering the tenant holder a certain degree of security, did not attempt to satisfy his land hunger. Agrarian unrest continued unabated. Subsequent enactments, the Land Purchase Acts of 1885, 1891 and 1896, and particularly the Irish Land Act of 1903, authorised advances by the Land Commissioners to tenants for the purchase of their holdings with the consent of the landlords. The tenant thereby nominally became an "owner," without obtaining any real improvement in his condition, for what he originally paid in rent to the landlord he now paid in the form of annuity and interest to the bondholder. Moreover, not many landlords were willing to surrender the land even at the munificent prices offered and forego the exploitation of their tenant holders. Finally, under the continued pressure of agrarian unrest, the Irish Land Act of 1909 was passed providing for the compulsory sale of land held by tenant holders anxious to buy out their holdings.

The Socialist-Revolutionaries, when they betrayed the principle of alienation without compensation proclaimed by their own party congresses, were going no further than the agrarian reforms "of the Irish type" carried out by the British government.

PAGE 399.* The manifesto addressed "To the Workers, Soldiers and Peasants," the Decree on Peace and the Decree on the Land were adopted by the Second Congress of Soviets on November 7 and 8 (October 25 and 26), after the Provisional Government had been overthrown and the power had been seized by the proletariat of Petrograd with the support of the Petrograd garrison.

The vast majority of the proletariat all over the country had completely and unreservedly accepted the leadership of the Bolshevik Party. The peasant masses had deserted the Socialist-Revolutionary leaders and were resorting to direct revolutionary action. The more advanced sections of the poor peasantry were actively supporting the proletariat. Part of the army, which consisted largely of poor peasants, were equally active in their support of the revolution, while the rest of the army observed an attitude of sympathetic neutrality. Such were the conditions in which the revolution in Petrograd was accomplished. The revolution was immediately endorsed by the Second Congress of Soviets. With a rapidity which two or three months before would have appeared incredible, the revolution spread throughout the country, everywhere being accomplished, as in Petrograd, under the leadership of the Leninist Party.

The Revolutionary Military Committee which was set up by the Petrograd Soviet, and which performed a tremendous work in organising the insurrection, had assumed definite form and begun this work on October 29 (16), after a joint meeting of the Central Committee of the Bolshevik Party and representatives from military organisations, factory and workshop committees and trade unions, at which the resolution on armed insurrection adopted by the Central Committee on October 23 (10) was endorsed (see p. 303 and the corresponding note). This meeting appointed a military committee of five (Stalin, Dzerzhinsky, Uritsky, Bubnov and Sverdlov), which joined the Revolutionary Military Committee of the Petrograd Soviet. Through the intermediary of this committee of five the work of the Revolutionary Military Committee came under the direct guidance of the Central Committee of the Party. From November 7 (October 25) on, Lenin assumed the direct leadership of the Revolutionary Military Committee. At its meeting on November 3 (October 21), the Central Committee appointed groups to reinforce the Executive Committee of the Petrograd Soviet and to assist the Bolshevik fraction in the Soviet (Stalin, Sverdlov and V. Milyutin formed this second group). The Central Committee also gave the Revolutionary Military Committee a plan of insurrection, drawn up along the lines of Lenin's letters to the Central Committee. On November 6 (October 24), i.e., on the eve of the insurrection, a meeting of the Central Committee was held under the guidance of Lenin. This meeting received the report of the Revolutionary Military Committee on the work of organising the insurrection, settled certain last-minute organisational questions of the insurrection, and charged Dzerzhinsky, Milyutin and Sverdlov with a number of duties connected with the insurrection and the seizure of power.

Ever since February the Party, following Lenin's programme of revolution, had been carrying on tremendous political and organisational work in mobilising the forces of the proletariat. It had driven a wedge between the working class masses, followed by the soldier and peasant masses, and the leadership of the petty-bourgeois parties. It had mobilised the soldiers and peasants under the leadership of the Party in pursuance of the aim of winning the poor peasants over to the proletariat and of securing support for the proletarian revolution from the general peasant war against the landlords. This, and the direct leadership assumed by the Party, its Central Committee, and Lenin himself, of the organisation of the insurrection after the mobilisation of the forces of the revolution in every decisive point in the country had been completed, guaranteed the success of the October Revolution.

Thanks to Lenin's tactics, at the moment of the October Revolution the Provisional Government and the petty-bourgeois parties had been completely deprived of the support of the masses of workers, soldiers and peasants. Thanks to Lenin's leadership of the preparations for the insurrection, the insurrectionary proletariat found itself at the decisive moment in possession of all the key positions and strongholds in the capital (including even the telegraph and telephone offices). Thanks to the preliminary work performed by the Party among the armies at the front, Kerensky, who had been sent by the Provisional Government to the North-Western front, could persuade nobody but a few Cossack companies to move against revolutionary Petrograd (see note to p. 400 *). The Provisional Government, which in Petrograd itself succeeded in securing the protection only of the military cadets and the female shock troops, was seized in the Winter Palace when the latter was stormed in the early morning of November 7 (October 25), when the whole city was practically in the hands of the insurrectionaries.

At 10 a.m. that day, Lenin was in a position to address the following words "To the Citizens of Russia" in the name of the Revolutionary Military Committee:

"The Provisional Government has been overthrown. The power of state has passed into the hands of the organ of the Petrograd Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies—the Revolutionary Military Committee, which is leading the Petrograd proletariat and garrison.

"The cause for which the people have fought, namely, the immediate proposal of a democratic peace, the abolition of landed proprietorship, workers' control over production and the creation of a Soviet government—the success of that cause is guaranteed.

"Long live the revolution of the soldiers, workers and peasants!"

At 2 p.m. that same day Lenin made a brief report to a general meeting of the Petrograd Soviet on "The Tasks of the Government of the Soviets." He began with the declaration that "the workers' and peasants' revolution, of the necessity for which the Bolsheviks have spoken all along, has been accomplished." He called for the building in Russia of a "proletarian socialist state," and ended his speech with the slogan "Long live the world socialist revolution!" In connection with Lenin's report the Petrograd Soviet adopted a brief resolution, written by Lenin himself, in which, as in Lenin's message "To the Citizens of Russia," the fundamental demands of the revolution were enumerated, viz., the creation of a Soviet government, the immediate proposal of a democratic peace to the warring peoples, the abolition of landed proprietorship and the transfer of the land to the peasantry, workers' control over the production and distribution of goods, and national control over the banks, which were to be fused into a single state enterprise. The resolution concluded with an appeal to all workers and peasants in the country self-sacrificingly to support the workers' and peasants' revolution, and to the proletariat of the West European countries to aid "the complete and lasting success of the cause of socialism."

Late in the evening (about 11 p.m.) of November 7 (October 25), following the meeting of the Petrograd Soviet, the Second Congress of Soviets opened. This Congress had been summoned by the Menshevik-Socialist-Revolutionary All-Russian Central Executive Committee which had been elected in June 1917 by the First Congress of Soviets. It was attended by 670 delegates, among whom there were only 68 Mensheviks and 24 Socialist-Revolutionaries not belonging to the Left Wing of that party. The majority of the delegates consisted of Bolsheviks (300) and Left Socialist-Revolutionaries (169). After a presidium consisting of Bolsheviks and Left Socialist-Revolutionaries had been elected, the Mensheviks and the Chernov Socialist-Revolutionaries withdrew from the Congress, after reading a declaration in which they protested against "the military conspiracy and seizure of power organised by the Bolsheviks behind the backs of the other parties and fractions represented in the Soviets." They were followed by the Menshevik-Internationalists (the Martov group—see notes to pp. 125  and 241 *), the Bundists and the Paoli-Zionists. The Congress responded by a resolution in which it described the withdrawal of these groups from the Congress as a criminal but futile attempt "to thwart the sovereign representation of the worker and soldier masses at a time when the vanguard of these masses was defending, weapon in hand, the Congress and the revolution from the onslaught of counter-revolution." The resolution went on to say that "the withdrawal of the compromisers will not enfeeble, but rather strengthen the Soviets, since it will purify the workers' and peasants' revolution from counter-revolutionary admixtures."

The Congress thereupon proceeded to deal with the main problems arising out of "the workers' and peasants' revolution."

In conformity with the plan adopted by the Central Committee of the Bolshevik Party at its meeting of November 3 (October 21), the Congress, in the event of the success of the uprising, was to consider the questions which were mentioned in Lenin's message "To the Citizens of Russia" and in the resolution of the Petrograd Soviet as the fundamental and immediate aims of the revolution. At this meeting, too, the Central Committee entrusted the duty of making the reports and preparing the resolutions for the Second Congress on the questions of war and peace, land and the creation of a Soviet government to Lenin, and on the question of workers' control to V. Milyutin. Naturally, before proceeding to hear and discuss the reports on these questions, it was incumbent on the Congress to define its attitude to the revolution of November 7 (October 25) itself. This attitude was expressed in the manifesto "To the Workers, Soldiers and Peasants," written by Lenin and adopted by the Congress, which in its fundamental lines entirely coincided with the message "To the Citizens of Russia" and the resolution of the Petrograd Soviet. The manifesto was adopted after a brief exchange of opinions, as a result of which the Congress expressed its agreement 1) with a proposal made by Kamkov in the name of the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries to insert a statement in the manifesto to the effect that the transfer of the land to the peasants would be effected by placing the land under the control of the peasants' committees, and 2) with the proposal of the delegates from the Peasants' Soviets that their signatures should also be appended to the manifesto.

At the second session of the Congress, held on November 8 (October 26), the "Report on the Peace Question" and the "Report on the Land Question," which are reproduced here, were heard, and the Decree on Peace and the Decree on the Land, compiled by Lenin and embodied in these reports, were adopted. A decision was then taken to form a Soviet government. An All-Russian Central Executive Committee was elected consisting of 105 members, 69 of whom were Bolsheviks, 29 Left Socialist-Revolutionaries, six Social-Democratic Internationalists, and one Socialist-Revolutionary Maximalist. The question of workers' control was referred to the newly elected All-Russian Central Executive Committee.

All the acts of the Congress, from the manifesto "To the Workers, Soldiers and Peasants" to the elections of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee, expressed the proletarian character of the October Revolution. They marked that revolution as a socialist revolution, which in passing consummated the bourgeois-democratic, peasant revolution (on this question cf. Lenin's article "The Fourth Anniversary of the October Revolution," pp. 500-08 in the present volume, and the note to it). By the creation of a central Soviet government and the broadcasted appeal for the organisation of the Soviet power in the localities, the beginnings of a proletarian socialist state were laid. The Decree on Peace, with its proposal for an immediate armistice to be followed by a peace based upon the renunciation of all seizures and annexations and upon the complete right of self-determination for all nations, large and small, and its appeal to the toiling masses of the warring countries to secure peace by revolutionary means—this decree was a call to the proletariat of these countries to make a socialist revolution. The Decree on the Land was an expression of the consummation of the bourgeois-democratic revolution of the peasants, and at the same time it was the first step towards the transformation of the peasant revolution into a proletarian revolution. This decree gave concrete form to the idea of the feasibility of making concessions to the peasant masses which was expressed by Lenin before the October Revolution in his article "Peasants and Workers" (pp. 380-88 in the present volume). The Decree on the Land was based on the summary of the 242 peasants' Instructions on the land question brought by the delegates to the First All-Russian Congress of Peasants' Deputies (see note to p. 380 *). This put into effect not the nationalisation of the land, advocated by the Bolsheviks, but what was known as the "socialisation of the land" accomplished by equal land tenure. When Lenin proposed that this programme of the agrarian revolution—which had been betrayed by the Socialist-Revolutionary Party, led by Chernov and Avksentyev, but to which the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries had remained faithful—should be embodied in a decree of the Congress of Soviets, he was motivated by the consideration that in order to consolidate the power seized by the proletariat it was essential to make concessions to the petty-proprietor sentiments of the middle peasants, and to the poor peasants, who still had a very faint understanding of the aims of the proletarian revolution in the countryside. It remained for the proletariat to prove to the poor peasants, and after them to the middle peasants, on the basis of their own experience, that the hopes they placed in equal land tenure were vain, and that the proletarian, i.e., the Bolshevik programme for remoulding agriculture on the basis of the nationalisation of the land was far superior. Lenin justified the concessions made to the peasants on the grounds that under the dictatorship of the proletariat "equal land tenure" could not harm the cause of socialism, whereas the abolition of the landed estates and of private property in land would strengthen the proletarian dictatorship, would be an important step towards the Bolshevik nationalisation of the land, and would open the way for the reform of rural life along socialist lines. Lenin shortly afterwards dealt specifically with this question of concessions to the peasants in his article "An Alliance Between the Workers and the Toiling and Exploited Peasants" (pp. 425-27 in the present volume). And, indeed, the Decree on the Land adopted by the Second Congress of Soviets proved to be but the first step in the agrarian reforms of the proletarian revolution. The next steps were the Decree on the Socialisation of the Land promulgated in 1918, which speaks not only of equal land tenure, but also of collectivisation, and the decree of 1919, which proclaimed all land the property of the state, in other words nationalised the land, as demanded by the Bolshevik agrarian programme.

The October Revolution and the decisions of the Second Congress of Soviets in the main completed the transition from the bourgeois revolution to the proletarian revolution which had been foreshadowed in Lenin's "Letters From Afar" and his April Theses (pp. 3-12 and 21-26 in the present volume). But in the countryside this transition, this growth of the bourgeois-democratic revolution into the proletarian revolution, was not consummated by the October Revolution, since, as Stalin points out in his book Leninism, the October Revolution, although it brought about the overthrow of the bourgeoisie and the transfer of power to the proletariat, did not immediately lead to the final completion of the bourgeois revolution in general, and to the isolation of the kulaks in the rural districts in particular; these were delayed for a certain period of time (see note to p. 486,* also Selected Works, Vol. VII, "The Proletarian Revolution and the Renegade Kautsky," the chapter entitled "Subservience to the Bourgeoisie in the Guise of 'Economic Analysis'"). The fundamental and most important feature of the October Revolution was its socialist character as expressed in the overthrow of the bourgeoisie, the establishment of the dictatorship of the proletariat, and the first transitional measures to a developed programme of socialist construction. The October proletarian revolution, by striking at a comparatively weak link in the imperialist chain—Russian imperialism—snapped the chain at this link. This was a blow at imperialism in general. It showed the proletariat of other countries and other oppressed nationalities how the struggle against imperialism must be fought. The Russian October Revolution was the beginning of the world proletarian revolution.

PAGE 400.* The reference is to the attempt made by Kerensky to organise an attack on revolutionary Petrograd. Even before the insurrection of the Petrograd proletariat and garrison had broken out, the Provisional Government gave orders to bring troops into Petrograd, hoping that the reinforcements would arrive before November 6-7 (October 24-25). Kerensky set out to meet the expected reinforcements. Meanwhile the government was overthrown. This, however, did not deter Kerensky, nor the Socialist-Revolutionary and the Menshevik leaders, who in their turn, together with the Cadets, and through the intermediary of a counter-revolutionary organisation which was then set up under the name of the Committee of the Salvation of the Fatherland and the Revolution, set about organising a revolt of the military cadets (Junkers) and the Cossack divisions against the triumphant proletariat within the city itself. Except for a few Cossack companies, Kerensky found no support among the troops on the North-Western front. With these Cossack companies, commanded by General Krasnov, Kerensky moved on Petrograd, relying upon an uprising of the Junkers and Cossacks within the city. Kerensky's detachment, meeting with practically no resistance, advanced through Gatchina and Tsarskoye (now Detskoye) Syelo to Pulkovo, where it succeeded in establishing contact with supporters of the Provisional Government in that city. But between November 8 and November 11 (October 26 and 29), the Revolutionary Military Committee in Petrograd, whose activities were being guided by Lenin personally and by a number of other members of the Central Committee of the Bolshevik Party, had taken energetic measures to organise its forces for the suppression of the counter-revolutionary attack upon Petrograd and the counter-revolutionary revolt within Petrograd. The Revolutionary Military Committee had also carried on vigorous agitation in the garrisons of the cities through which Kerensky's detachment was to pass. The Junkers, provoked to revolt by the Cadets and the Socialist-Revolutionaries within the city, were surrounded by the forces of the Revolutionary Military Committee and crushed immediately. The Junkers were not joined by the Cossack divisions within the city, while the Cossack detachments of Kerensky and Krasnov were met and repulsed by the forces of the Revolutionary Military Committee at Pulkovo. Realising their impotence in the face of the organised forces of the proletarian revolution, they laid down their arms. General Krasnov was taken prisoner. Kerensky managed to flee, and later with the help of the Allies escaped abroad.

PAGE 403.* The Chartist movement (1836-48) was the first political movement in England in which the proletariat put forward its own independent class demands. The principal demand of the Charter was the extension of the suffrage to the working class, a demand which was rejected by the government. This only served to stimulate the movement, which took the form of mass demonstrations of the workers and armed collisions with the police. In spite of the defeat suffered by the Chartists, the ruling classes of England, the landlords and capitalists, were obliged to make certain concessions to the working class.

PAGE 403. The Anti-Socialist Law was passed by the German Reichstag on October 1, 1878, at the instance of the Imperial Chancellor, Bismarck. The law proclaimed the organisations of the German Social-Democratic Party to be illegal; it closed down the Socialist press, prohibited working class meetings, etc. The police were given powers to deport violators of this law without trial. In spite of the fact that the German Social-Democrats were obliged to refrain from public activities, thanks to their illegal and semi-legal work they succeeded in securing 1,500,000 votes in the elections to the Reichstag in 1890, as compared with the 437,000 votes they polled in the elections of 1878, before the passage of the Anti-Socialist Law. This law was abolished in 1890.

PAGE 405.* Lenin is referring to the manifesto addressed "To All the Peoples of the World" by the Petrograd Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers'

Deputies, which was then controlled by the Mensheviks and the Socialist-Revolutionaries. The manifesto appealed for joint action for peace (see note to p. 150 ). In substance the manifesto was of a defencist character. The Socialist-Revolutionary-Menshevik Soviets in fact supported the policy of the Provisional Government of fighting the war to a successful conclusion. The demonstration of the soldiers and workers in April 1917 in response to Milyukov's note to the Allies (see note to p. 129 *) compelled the Executive Committee of the Petrograd Soviet to occupy itself once more with the problems of peace. But the Soviet did not go beyond an unsuccessful attempt to summon a Socialist conference in Stockholm together with the social-chauvinists. Russia's withdrawal from the war became possible only after the Provisional Government was overthrown and the dictatorship of the proletariat established.

PAGE 410.* Lenin's "Draft Statutes on Workers' Control" formed the basis for the Decree on Workers' Control passed by the All-Russian Central Executive Committee on November 27 (14), 1917. As pointed out in the note to p. 399,* the drafting of the resolution on this question for the Second Congress of Soviets was entrusted by the Central Committee of the Bolshevik Party to V. Milyutin on November 3 (October 21). The Congress was not able to discuss this question and confined itself to declaring in its manifesto "To the Workers, Soldiers and Peasants" that the Soviet government would "establish workers' control over production." The question was therefore referred to the All-Russian Central Executive Committee. It was first examined in the Labour Commission (the future Commissariat for Labour), where two drafts of the decree were presented, one the draft of the Central Council of Factory and Workshop Committees, and the other Lenin's draft here given. The Commission adopted Lenin's draft with certain amendments, and the decree in its final form, after adoption by the All-Russian Central Executive Committee and the Council of People's Commissars, was published on November 29 (16). The text given in this volume of Lenin's draft decree was, before its final adoption, published in Pravda of November 16 (3), 1917.

In conformity with the plan drawn up before the October Revolution (cf. Lenin's April Theses and the articles "The Tasks of the Proletariat in the Present Revolution" and "Can the Bolsheviks Retain State Power?" in the present volume), workers' control under the dictatorship of the proletariat was designed to subordinate private capitalist enterprises to the proletarian state and was to be a transitional measure to the remoulding of the economic system of Russia on socialist lines. Workers' control was intended to prevent speculation in all its forms, excessive prices and large profits, and also to prevent the sabotage of production and the closing down of factories by the capitalists. It was believed that in this way the economic disorganisation of the country would be cured, regular exchange of goods between town and country established, and thereby the alliance between the working class and the peasant masses strengthened and the dictatorship of the proletariat consolidated. The statutes on workers' control did not provide for the abolition of private ownership of capital and of industrial enterprises; but they were, nevertheless, intended as a step towards its abolition. The subordination of the factory owner, the capitalist, to the control of the workers under the dictatorship of the proletariat could not but seriously curtail the powers of the capitalist in the factory and result in his being squeezed out of industry and expropriated. Workers' control was also intended as a first step towards training the working class in the management of industry. Lenin repeatedly referred to the importance of such training, for the sake of which, he said, we may well pay capitalists and experts munificently. However, workers' control was in practice often frustrated by the sabotage of the capitalists and of the experts whose interests were most closely identified with those of the capitalists. This fact hastened the expropriation of capitalist enterprises.

Subsequent decrees, such as the decree establishing the Supreme Council of National Economy in place of the Committee of State Control and those providing for the socialisation of industry and the nationalisation of the banks, were measures designed to develop the statutes on workers' control, and in many respects went farther than the statutes. Workers' control performed an extremely important function at one of the most difficult stages of the proletarian revolution. On the eve of the October Revolution it served as a battle-cry calling the proletariat to storm the old bourgeois system. After the conquest of power by the proletariat it helped to prevent the complete destruction of industry, which was being disorganised and disrupted by the capitalists. It was the first experiment in training the masses of the workers in the administration of industry, and consolidated the successes of the October Revolution.

PAGE 412.* This letter "From the Central Committee of the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party (Bolsheviks) to Comrades Kamenev, Zinoviev, Ryazanov and Larin," as well as the letter of the Central Committee addressed "To All Party Members and to All the Toiling Classes of Russia," which follows it in this volume, were provoked by the resignation from responsible posts of a group of Right Bolsheviks at a difficult moment in the proletarian revolution. Right vacillations were not new—they had already been manifested at the April Party Conference (see notes to pp. 31 * and 88 *) and on the eve of the October Revolution itself (cf. in this volume "A Letter to the Comrades," "A Letter to the Members of the Bolshevik Party" and "A Letter to the Central Committee of the Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party," and the note to them). The Right Bolsheviks did not believe in the success of the proletarian revolution; they did not believe that it would be supported by the poor peasants, nor did they believe in the possibility of socialist construction in Russia. Hence, upon the least pressure exerted by the petty-bourgeois parties, which demanded the creation of a Socialist government representing all parties, from the semi-Cadet Narodni-Socialists to the Bolsheviks, the Rights began to waver. The Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks, who, although beaten in Petrograd, continued to carry on armed war against the proletarian revolution all over the country, and the Vikzhel (the Executive Committee of the All-Russian Union of Railwaymen—see note to p. 315 *) demanded that the Bolsheviks should stop the civil war and form a government which would include some of the most malicious enemies of the proletarian revolution from among the petty-bourgeois "Socialists." This demand was supported by the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries, who threatened a complete rupture with the Bolsheviks, while the Vikzhel threatened to call a strike. This demand was considered by the Central Committee of the Bolshevik Party on November 9 (October 27) and by the All-Russian Central Executive Committee, and it was decided to supplement the Soviet government by representatives from the petty-bourgeois "Socialist" parties only on condition that the latter recognised all the decrees adopted by the Second Congress of Soviets and their answerability to the All-Russian Central Executive Committee, in other words that they recognised the October Revolution and the dictatorship of the proletariat. But at the conference with the representatives of these parties, Kamenev, who headed the delegation appointed by the All-Russian Central Executive Committee to conduct the negotiations, failed to give the rebuff merited by such obviously provocative demands as that Lenin should resign from the Council of People's Commissars and that a Right Socialist-Revolutionary, Avksentyev or Chernov, should be appointed Chairman of the government. Even after this Kamenev continued negotiations. At a plenary meeting of the Central Committee of the Bolshevik Party, the majority declared in favour of breaking off negotiations or, at least, of entirely changing their character. The minority, however (Kamenev, Rykov, Ryazanov and Milyutin), insisted that a government be formed jointly with the petty-bourgeois parties and that the negotiations be continued along the previous lines, asserting that otherwise power could not be maintained. The Central Committee of the Party sharply rebuked the Rights for their vacillations and instructed the delegation appointed to conduct the negotiations for the formation of the government to expose for the last time the futility of the scheme to create a government consisting of all the so-called Socialist parties and thereupon to break off negotiations. The same day the All-Russian Central Executive Committee instructed its delegates who were to hold a conference with the Vikzhel to insist upon the acceptance of the conditions proposed by the Central Committee of the Bolshevik Party. On November 15 (2) the Central Committee, in its turn, passed a resolution declaring that no concessions to the ultimatum of the petty-bourgeois parties could be tolerated. All this, however, proved insufficient for the group of Right Bolsheviks in the Central Committee and the Council of People's Commissars. At a meeting of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee on November 15 (2) the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries demanded that the decision of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee should be revised, on the grounds that "only an immediate union of the whole revolutionary front can save the toiling classes from economic disaster and from the impending counter-revolution." In reply, the Right Bolsheviks, through Zinoviev, who had just previously announced the resolution of the Central Committee of November 15 (2), declared that this resolution had not yet been discussed by the Bolshevik fraction. At the meeting of the Bolshevik fraction they, despite the Central Committee, introduced a number of amendments to the resolution, the purport of which was that the fraction consented to admit representation on the All-Russian Central Executive Committee of the Vikzhel, the City Dumas, and the Soviets of Peasants' Deputies, new elections to which had not yet been held. This amounted to open sabotage of the line of the Central Committee of the Party. Thereupon the majority of the Central Committee, which met on the following day, endorsed the text of an ultimatum to the Right members of the Central Committee drawn up and proposed by Lenin.

"This monstrous violation of discipline," the ultimatum ran, "on the part of members of the Central Committee behind the backs of the Central Committee and after many hours of discussion within the Central Committee, provoked by these representatives of the opposition themselves, makes it clear to us that it is the intention of the opposition to take the Party organisations by siege, by sabotaging the work of the Party at a time when the immediate result of that work will determine the fate of the Party and the fate of the revolution. . . . We demand a categorical reply in written form to the question: Does the minority undertake to submit to Party discipline and to carry out the policy which is formulated in the resolution of Comrade Lenin adopted by the Central Committee?"

"In the event of a negative or indefinite reply to this question, we shall immediately place before the Petrograd Committee, the Moscow Committee, the Bolshevik fraction of the Central Executive Committee, the Petrograd City Conference and the Extraordinary Congress of the Party the following alternative:

"Either the Party entrusts the present opposition with the task of forming a new government in conjunction with their allies, on whose behalf the opposition are now sabotaging our work—in which case we shall reserve ourselves absolute freedom of action in relation to this government, which will be incapable of offering anything but vacillation, impotence and chaos.

"Or, which we do not doubt, the Party endorses the only possible revolutionary line, as expressed in yesterday's decision of the Central Committee, in which case the Party must definitely propose to the representatives of the opposition that they carry on their work of disorganisation outside the ranks of the Party organisation. There is, and can be, no other alternative. Of course, a split would be highly deplorable. But an honest and open split would now be infinitely better than internal sabotage, violation of our own decisions, disorganisation and prostration. We, at any rate, do not for a moment doubt that if we were to place our differences (which in all fundamentals reproduce our differences with the Novaya Zhizn group and the Martov group) before the court of the masses, our policy would be guaranteed the unconditional and self-sacrificing support of the revolutionary workers, soldiers and peasants, and the vacillating opposition would very soon be doomed to isolation and impotence."

In reply to this ultimatum, the Right Bolsheviks tendered their resignation from responsible posts on the Central Committee of the Party and the All-Russian Central Executive Committee of the Soviets. Their declaration of resignation accused the Party and the Soviet government of having instituted a political terrorism which would lead "to the removal of the mass organisations of the proletariat from the leadership of political life, to the establishment of an irresponsible regime, and to the destruction of the revolution and the country." Thus the Right Bolsheviks endeavoured to conceal their capitulation in face of the difficulties of the struggle by calling for the salvation of the revolution. The declaration was signed by Kamenev, Zinoviev, Rykov, Shlyapnikov, Ryazanov, Larin and Nogin (Lunacharsky handed in a separate declaration).

The second ultimatum of the Central Committee to Kamenev, Zinoviev, Ryazanov and Larin, reproduced here, and the letter to the Party and the toilers of Russia published in Pravda on November 20 (7), 1917, forced Zinoviev to make a public declaration in Pravda of November 21 (8) announcing the withdrawal of his resignation from the Central Committee. But Kamenev, Milyutin, Nogin and Rykov did not participate again in the work of the Central Committee. Kamenev, Ryazanov and Larin replied to the ultimatum of the Central Committee and its letter to the Party and the toilers of Russia by presenting an anti-Party declaration to the Central Committee which revealed their true attitude to the Party and to Bolshevik discipline. In this declaration they referred to "the pogromist style of the proclamations of the Central Committee," pronounced intolerable the demand that they should give written guarantees, whereas the demand that they should carry out the policy of the Central Committee in all their actions and utterances they characterised as "an unprecedented demand that they should act against their own convictions." V. Milyutin and M. Derbyshev associated themselves with this anti-Party declaration.

PAGE 413.* The incident referred to is the negotiations held on November 8 (October 26), 1917, between the Central Committee of the Bolshevik Party and the leaders of the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries, Spiro, Karelin and Kamkov, regarding the participation of the latter in the Council of People's Commissars in the capacity of People's Commissars. At first the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries refused to participate in the Council of People's Commissars, and the Second Congress of Soviets accordingly set up a government consisting exclusively of Bolsheviks. The vacillations of the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries continued for nearly a month, during which they presented ultimatums demanding that all the petty-bourgeois Socialist parties be represented in the government (see the preceding note). It was not until November 28 (15) that they at last consented to join the government.

PAGE 416.* The conspiracy of Purishkevich was discovered on November 16 (3), 1917. The principal aim of his organisation was to restore the monarchy in Russia. Purishkevich and his confederates endeavoured to establish closer connections with the Cadets and the Right Socialist-Revolutionaries in order to overthrow the Soviet power by their joint efforts. The organisation maintained contact with Kaledin; it organised the officers and Junkers with the aid of the Military League and made preparations for a revolt in Petrograd, relying upon Kaledin's advance on the capital.

PAGE 416. The reference is to the declaration made by the Mensheviks on November 16 (3) at a conference organised by the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries and the All-Russian Central Executive Committee of the Railwaymen's Union (Vikzhel) on the question of creating a "homogeneous Socialist government." As a condition preliminary to the negotiations, the Mensheviks, Abramovich and Martov, demanded the discontinuance of the struggle against the counter-revolutionary parties (in particular the Cadets) and the institution of complete freedom of the press. This latter demand also figured in the declarations of the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries and in the proposals of the Right Bolsheviks: at the meeting of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee held on November 17 (4), 1917, the Right Bolsheviks, as well as the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries, demanded the abolition of the decree on the press. The demand was rejected by the majority of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee. The resolution proposed by the Bolshevik fraction and adopted by the All-Russian Central Executive Committee read:

"The closing down of the bourgeois papers was due not only to purely strategical considerations during the period of insurrection and the suppression of counter-revolutionary actions, but was also an essential measure for the establishment of a new regime for the press, a regime under which the capitalists—who own the printing establishments and the paper—shall not become autocratic manufacturers of public opinion. . . . The restoration of what is called freedom of the press, in other words, the simple return of the printing houses and paper to the capitalists, those poisoners of the public mind, would be an intolerable capitulation to the will of capital and the surrender of one of the most important positions of the workers' and peasants' revolution. It would in fact be a counter-revolutionary measure." The resolution concluded by condemning the "blackmail dictated by petty-bourgeois prejudices, or by direct subserviency to the interests of the counter-revolutionary bourgeoisie."

At this meeting of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee, the Right Bolsheviks and the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries announced their resignation from the posts they occupied.

PAGE 416. The 17th Army Corps was stationed at Nevel. A section of the Cossacks forming part of the corps were hostile to the Soviets; nevertheless, the detachment from the 17th Army Corps appointed to assist Kerensky in suppressing the insurrection in Petrograd proved to be unreliable and had to be reinforced even before it could be entrained. With great difficulty the detachment reached Luga on November 14 (1). By that time the Kerensky-Krasnov expedition had collapsed: Kerensky fled, while the Cossack divisions, headed by General Krasnov, were surrounded by Red Guards and surrendered (see note to p. 400. *)

PAGE 418.* The appeal "To the Population" was written and signed by Lenin in his capacity of Chairman of the Council of People's Commissars and published in the press, in particular in Pravda of November 20 (7), 1917. It was evoked by strikes and sabotage of higher officials and employees, which became very widespread after the suppression of the first attempts at counter-revolution in Petrograd and Moscow (see notes to pp. 400 * and 418 ). The army of officials and clerical employees, who identified their interests with the landlords and bourgeoisie and served the latter loyally and faithfully, were hostile to the seizure of power by the working class and the reconstruction of the state apparatus undertaken by the latter. Cadets, ministers of the Provisional Government still at liberty, and the Menshevik and Socialist-Revolutionary parties took every advantage of this spirit of hostility in order to organise strikes and sabotage. The official general staff of the saboteurs was the counter-revolutionary Committee of the Salvation of the Fatherland and the Revolution, consisting of Socialist-Revolutionaries, Cadets and Mensheviks. Material resources were supplied by the higher bank officials out of government funds. Funds were also provided by the French and British embassies. The campaign of sabotage was smashed by the firm action of the Bolshevik Party and the working class masses. Not only the medium categories of clerical workers, but also the highly-placed experts were obliged to return to their posts by the beginning of 1918. The Soviet government displayed then, as it does now, extreme tact and consideration towards those clerical workers, and particularly experts, who were prepared to serve the proletarian state honestly. Lenin never tired of pointing out that the Communists could not build up socialism by their own efforts alone. The toiling masses must avail themselves of the knowledge and experience of the experts, who, in return for the training so given, must be placed in a favoured position as regards remuneration and living conditions generally. At every subsequent stage of socialist construction and the class struggle in the period of the dictatorship of the proletariat, including the period 1928 and later, when the growing acuteness of the class struggle was marked by criminal activities on the part of counter-revolutionary organisations and interventionist wreckers (e.g., the Industrial Party headed by Ramzin, the so-called Peasant Labour Party headed by Chayanov and Kondratyev, the Menshevik "Union Bureau of the Central Committee" headed by Sukhanov [Himmer] and Groman, and the wrecking at electric power stations carried on with the assistance of British engineers of the firm of Metropolitan Vickers), the Soviet government preserved, and still preserves, the attitude towards the experts of the old regime which was indicated by Lenin; while waging ruthless war on all counter-revolutionaries, wreckers and interventionists among the experts, it shows the greatest consideration and attention towards those specialists who are working hand in hand with the working class to build up socialism.

PAGE 418. Armed fighting for the Soviet power in Moscow lasted eight days, from November 7 to November 15 (October 25 to November 2). The fighting was longer drawn out in Moscow than in Petrograd largely for the reason that the supporters of the Provisional Government had at first a considerable superiority of forces. The Committee of Public Safety organised by the Socialist-Revolutionaries, the Mensheviks and the Moscow Duma succeeded in mobilising large numbers of officers, Junkers and students against the Revolutionary Military Committee. Defeated in Petrograd, the bourgeoisie determined at all costs to consolidate its position in the second capital, Moscow, and to make it the headquarters of the counter-revolution. But the proletariat and the soldiers of Moscow had been sufficiently prepared by the Bolshevik Party. While the forces of counter-revolution melted away, the Red Guard received ever fresh reinforcements from the factories. The whole garrison of Moscow took part in the fight against the bourgeoisie and the Provisional Government.

The fighting in Moscow was also drawn out owing to the irresolution displayed by certain of the leaders of the uprising in admitting three representatives of petty-bourgeois parties hostile to the insurrection to the Revolutionary Military Committee. The Revolutionary Military Committee itself committed several mistakes, as a result of which the Whites were able to seize the Kremlin and consolidate their position in the centre of the city. One mistake was the readiness with which the Revolutionary Military Committee twice entered into negotiations with the Whites, upon the proposal of the latter, regarding the possible cessation of armed fighting. Another great mistake was that the Revolutionary Military Committee, after the capitulation of the counter-revolutionaries, allowed the officers and Junkers to go free and even to take their arms with them. This lenient treatment of the enemies of the revolution led to dire results, since it permitted the officers to make their way to the South, there again to resume the armed struggle against the Soviet government.

PAGE 421.* The Extraordinary Congress of Soviets of Peasants' Deputies at which Lenin delivered his "Speech on the Agrarian Question" and submitted the draft resolution here reproduced, opened in Petrograd on November 23 (10), 1917. An Ordinary Congress of Peasants' Deputies had originally been appointed by the Executive Committee of the All-Russian Soviet of Peasants' Deputies elected at the First Congress (see note to p. 349*) for October 3 (September 20), but was subsequently postponed to November 2 (October 20). The Executive Committee, headed by the Right Socialist-Revolutionaries, foresaw that the majority of the delegates would be opposed to its policy. It was therefore anxious to prevent the meeting of the Ordinary Congress and at the beginning of November adopted a decision once more to postpone the Congress, this time until December 13 (November 30). The intention was to use the interval to shuffle the Congress. In order to frustrate this plan and at the same time to give the peasants the opportunity of declaring their attitude towards the October Revolution, the All-Russian Central Executive Committee, elected by the Second All-Russian Congress of Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers'

Deputies, decided at its first meeting on November 9 (October 27) to take the initiative of summoning an Extraordinary Congress of Peasants' Deputies and set up a commission for this purpose. The old Executive Committee made a vain attempt to frustrate the Extraordinary Congress on the eve of its convocation by proposing that the deputies who had arrived for the Congress should transfer to Moghilev, where the headquarters of the army was situated and where at that time were to be found Avksentyev and Chernov, the leaders of the Executive Committee; the pretext given was that if the Congress were held in Petrograd, the Bolsheviks would immediately arrest the leaders of the Soviet of Peasants' Deputies, Avksentyev and Chernov.

The Congress was attended by 480 voting delegates, of whom 195 were Left Socialist-Revolutionaries, 65 Right Socialist-Revolutionaries (followers of Chernov and Avksentyev), 37 Bolsheviks and 33 members of other parties (Mensheviks, anarchists, etc.). The Congress was a stormy one. The struggle waged by the Bolsheviks against the Right Socialist-Revolutionaries was complicated by the vacillations of the Lefts in the Socialist-Revolutionary Party, who at that time still endeavoured to preserve the unity of their party. In the end, however, under the pressure of the Bolsheviks, the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries made up their minds to fight the Rights. The Rights withdrew from the Congress.

The principal question discussed by the Congress was the composition of the Soviet government. The Left Socialist-Revolutionaries at first held to their old opinion that the government must be a homogeneous Socialist government representing all parties, from Bolsheviks to Narodni-Socialists. After the negotiations between the Bolsheviks and the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries regarding the participation of the latter in the Council of People's Commissars had ended satisfactorily, the Congress on December 1 (November 18), 1917, having heard Lenin's report on the agreement reached with the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries, unanimously adopted a resolution endorsing the policy of the Council of People's Commissars and the conditions for the formation of a government agreed upon between the Bolsheviks and the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries. In addition to his report on the agrarian question delivered on November 27 (14) and his report on the agreement reached with the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries, delivered on December 1 (November 18), Lenin twice took part in the discussion on the declaration made by the representative of the All-Russian Executive Committee of the Railwaymen's Union (Vikzhel), Krutoshinsky, who accused the Bolsheviks of having started civil war and of hindering the creation of "a homogeneous Socialist government."

The Extraordinary Congress of Peasants' Deputies remained in session until the end of November (Old Style), when it merged with the Second Ordinary All-Russian Congress of Peasants' Deputies (see note to p. 428 *), which completed the recognition of the Soviet power by the representatives of the peasant masses and the union of the Peasants' Soviets with the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies to form a united All-Russian Central Executive Committee. This union had been approved in principle by the Extraordinary Congress, which on November 28 (15) (with the exception of the Right Wing, which had withdrawn from the Congress) met in the Smolny Institute in joint session with the All-Russian Central Executive Committee, with which it merged.

Unfortunately, we have only a newspaper report, here reproduced, of the speech on the agrarian question delivered by Lenin at the Extraordinary Congress, for no verbatim report was taken. But even this newspaper report shows that Lenin's principal purpose was to achieve a final rupture between the peasant masses and the Right Socialist-Revolutionaries. This purpose is also pursued in Lenin's fairly severe criticism of the vacillations and instability of the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries, in the course of which he reminded them of the support they had given the Provisional Government and the irresolution they had displayed in the matter of breaking with the Right Socialist-Revolutionaries.

Lenin's draft resolution (pp. 423-24 in this volume) was not adopted by the Congress. The Left Socialist-Revolutionaries carried a resolution of their own, in which the Extraordinary Congress endorsed the decision of the First All-Russian Congress of Peasants' Deputies on the land question, which stated that the land should be transformed into national property without compensation and be held in tenure by the peasants in accordance with the equal labour standard. Furthermore, the Congress associated itself with the decision of the Second All-Russian Congress of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies to abolish private property in land, but declared that the land law in its final form must be promulgated by a National Constituent Assembly.

PAGE 422.* Lenin is referring not only to the behaviour of the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries at the Extraordinary Congress of Peasants' Deputies, but to their whole conduct ever since the October Revolution. When he speaks of the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries stretching out a hand to the Avksentyevs (the Right Socialist-Revolutionary leaders of the old Executive Committee of Peasants' Deputies) while offering the workers only a finger, he has in mind the fact that the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries for a long time insisted on the formation of a Soviet government made up of representatives from all the Socialist parties, that they had supported the ultimatums presented by the Right bourgeois parties to the Bolsheviks, and that they had for a long time refused to break with the Right Socialist-Revolutionaries.

PAGE 422. The reference is to the instructions governing the functions of the volost Land Committees issued by V. P. Milyutin as People's Commissar for Agriculture of the Soviet government and published in the Izvestiya of the Provisional Workers' and Peasants' Government on November 16 (3), 1917. These instructions had been originally adopted by the Agrarian Committee of the First All-Russian Congress of Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies and approved on July 6 (June 23), 1917, by the Congress itself, but owing to the bourgeois-landlord policy pursued by the Provisional Government had never obtained force of law.

PAGE 422. Lenin is referring to the speech of the Left Socialist-Revolutionary Kachinsky (who subsequently became a Communist). Kachinsky made the report to the Congress on the agrarian question, on which Lenin delivered the counter-report.

PAGE 425.* The article "An Alliance Between the Workers and the Toiling and Exploited Peasants" appeared in Pravda of December 2 (November 19), 1917. It was a reply to a question put to Lenin in connection with his report to the Extraordinary Congress of Peasants' Deputies on the conditions governing the agreement arrived at between the Bolsheviks and the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries. The article reproduces the body of that report, which was not taken down verbatim and has been preserved only in the form of a brief newspaper report.

For Lenin and the Bolshevik Party the question of arriving at an agreement, "an honest coalition," a "bloc," with the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries was at that particular stage a question of the relations between the proletariat and "the toiling and exploited peasants"; for at that time, as Lenin points out in this article, many peasants trusted the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries. Hence the title of the article: "An Alliance Between the Workers and the Toiling and Exploited Peasants." This article treats the question of the "alliance" from the point of view of the attitude of the proletariat and the Bolshevik Party to the agrarian demands of the peasants (socialisation of the land and equality of land tenure) and is closely linked with the "Report on the Land Question" delivered by Lenin at the Second Congress of Soviets on November 8 (October 26) (pp. 405-09 in the present volume). The article and the speech should therefore be studied conjointly. The "honest coalition" with the Socialist-Revolutionaries was a formal expression of the dictatorship of the proletariat and the poor peasantry set up by the Bolshevik Party in the October Revolution, since the poor peasantry formed the majority of the "toiling and exploited peasants" of whom Lenin speaks in this article. As Stalin says:

"We marched towards October under the slogan of the dictatorship of the proletariat and the poor peasantry and in October achieved it formally, inasmuch as we had a bloc with the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries and shared the leadership with them, although actually the dictatorship of the proletariat already existed, since we Bolsheviks constituted the majority. However, the dictatorship of the proletariat and the poor peasantry ceased to exist formally after the Left Socialist-Revolutionary putsch, after the rupture of the bloc with the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries, when the leadership passed completely and entirely into the hands of one party, into the hands of our Party, which does not share, and cannot share, the guidance of the state with any other party. This is what we mean by the dictatorship of the proletariat." (Stalin, Leninism, Vol. I, "The Three Basic Slogans of the Party on the Peasant Question.")

It was only formally that the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries represented the poor peasants in this "honest coalition" with the Bolsheviks. They were, as Lenin points out in his pamphlet The Proletarian Revolution and the Renegade Kautsky at that time only "the most radical, most revolutionary of the bourgeois-democratic ideologists of the peasantry" and closest to the proletariat. (Not italicised in original.) They represented the revolutionary-democratic strivings of "the peasantry in general," which they decked in the pseudo-socialist garb of "the socialisation of the land" and equal land tenure.

Since they were and remained petty-bourgeois democrats throughout the period of the coalition with the Bolsheviks, they constantly, and increasingly, vacillated towards the Right Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks and towards the bourgeoisie (e.g., on the question of the composition of the Soviet government, as well as in their hostility to the Peace of Brest-Litovsk and to Lenin's economic plan in the spring of 1918). They consequently lagged behind the poor peasants, whose interests they formally represented in this "honest coalition." And when "a year after the proletarian revolution in the capitals, under its influence and with its assistance, the proletarian revolution broke out in the remote rural districts," when the proletariat and the Bolshevik Party started the offensive of the poor peasants against the kulaks (the organisation of the Committees of Poor Peasants), the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries completely betrayed the "honest coalition" with the Bolsheviks; they betrayed the poor peasants and their alliance with the proletariat by organising in December 1918 a foolhardy rebellion against the dictatorship of the proletariat. When this rebellion was crushed by the proletarian dictatorship, the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries—with the exception of certain of their members, who joined the Communist Party—either remained forever in the camp of counter-revolution together with the Right Socialist-Revolutionaries, or entirely abandoned the political arena. In the chapter of his pamphlet The Proletarian Revolution and the Renegade Kautsky from which we have already quoted, Lenin refers to this subject in the following terms:

"The Czecho-Slovak counter-revolutionary mutiny [in May and June 1918.—Ed.] roused the kulaks. A wave of kulak insurrections swept over Russia. The poorest peasantry learned, not from books or newspapers, but from life, that its interests were irreconcilably antagonistic to those of the kulaks, of the rich, of the rural bourgeoisie. Like every other petty-bourgeois party, the 'Left Socialist-Revolutionaries' reflected the vacillation of the masses, and precisely in the summer of 1918 a split occurred among them: one section joined the Czecho-Slovaks (the insurrection in Moscow, when Proshyan, having seized the telegraph office—for one hour—informed Russia of the overthrow of the Bolsheviks; then the treachery of Muravyev, Commander-in-Chief of the army that was fighting against the Czecho-Slovaks, etc.) while another section, that mentioned above, remained with the Bolsheviks."

PAGE 428.* This "Speech Delivered at the Second All-Russian Congress of Peasants' Deputies," together with the manifesto to the peasantry which follows it in this volume, was one of the severest blows dealt to the old Right Socialist-Revolutionary leadership of the Peasants' Soviets by the Bolshevik Party. The Second (Ordinary) Congress of Peasants' Deputies, at which the leadership of the Peasants' Soviets finally passed to the proletarian government, opened on December 9 (November 16), 1917, immediately following on the Extraordinary Congress. It was attended by the delegates to the Extraordinary Congress and by the delegates summoned by the old Right Socialist-Revolutionary Executive Committee of the All-Russian Soviet of Peasants' Deputies. These delegates represented the gubernia Peasants' Soviets, and the Right Socialist-Revolutionaries placed great hopes in them. The presidium of the Extraordinary Congress also served as the presidium of the Second Congress, and thus the old Executive Committee was deprived of control of the Congress from the very outset. The Right Socialist-Revolutionaries were in the minority at this Congress also, but the fight assumed a most acute form. Lenin, speaking on the subject of the tax in kind on April 9, 1921, at a meeting of secretaries and representatives of Party nuclei of Moscow City and the Moscow Gubernia, said:

"The situation at first was one in which we discerned the pressure of the whole peasantry against the power of the landlords. The poor peasants and the kulaks were equally opposed to the landlords, although with different intentions; the purpose of the kulaks was to take the land from the landlords and to develop their own farms."

The purposes of the kulaks, of course, were not confined to the land question: they were utterly alien to the interests of the proletariat and to the true interests of the poor peasants on every cardinal question of the revolution. At the Second Congress of Peasants' Deputies (as at the Extraordinary Congress) the Right Wing, headed by the Right Socialist-Revolutionaries, followers of Chernov and Avksentyev, were in fact exponents of the purposes of the kulaks. Thus the fight of the Bolsheviks to deprive the Right Socialist-Revolutionaries of the leadership of the Peasants' Soviets was in fact a fight against the kulak leadership of the Soviets and against the resistance of the kulaks to the proletarian revolution. It was a fight to secure a radical demarcation of classes in the countryside, which was to end with the final consolidation of the Soviet power and of the Bolshevik Party. (See the preceding note.)

The conflict at the Second Peasants' Congress grew particularly acute over the question of the Constituent Assembly, the convocation of which had been postponed by a decision of the Council of People's Commissars, and over the decree which had been issued by the Soviet government proclaiming the Cadets the enemies of the people (cf. pp. 437-39 and the corresponding note). The kulak party, which the Right Socialist-Revolutionaries had in fact become in 1917, placed great hopes in the Constituent Assembly, in which, together with the Mensheviks and Cadets, it would have an absolute majority of seats, since the elections had taken place before the Right Socialist-Revolutionaries had been finally deserted by the peasant masses. This party continued to strive for an alliance with the counter-revolutionary bourgeoisie and, accordingly, with the Cadets. It was therefore only natural that the conflict at the Congress over these questions should become particularly acute.

Two resolutions were moved in connection with Lenin's report: one by the Right Socialist-Revolutionaries, declaring that the activities of the Council of People's Commissars were "criminal," and another by the Lefts, approving the decree of the Council of People's Commissars, although with certain reservations. The Bolsheviks read their own resolution, and thereupon withdrew it in order to vote for the resolution of the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries. The Congress at first adopted the resolution of the Right Socialist-Revolutionaries, but, after a re-vote, the resolution of the Lefts was approved. The Left Socialist-Revolutionaries, who still vacillated towards the Rights, made several attempts to render their resolution palatable to the Right Wing at the Congress, but in vain. The Rights withdrew from the Congress and organised a meeting of their own. After the departure of the Rights, the Congress adopted a resolution approving the policy of the Council of People's Commissars on the questions of war and peace, land, and the Constituent Assembly, and elected an All-Russian Executive Committee of the Soviets of Peasants' Deputies, consisting of 108 members (81 Left Socialist-Revolutionaries, 20 Bolsheviks and 7 others), which merged with the Central Executive Committee of the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies. The large number of delegates (about 300) who at the Congress supported the Right Socialist-Revolutionaries consisted principally of representatives from the gubernia Soviets of Peasants' Deputies—which had been elected at the beginning of the February Revolution—and were either kulaks or Socialist-Revolutionary intellectuals who defended the interests of the kulaks. The representatives of the peasant masses sided with the Bolsheviks or with the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries.

Throughout the Congress, its leaders, the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries Ustinov, Spiridonova, Kolegayev, Proshyan, and others, maintained permanent contact with Lenin. They frequently visited the Smolny and held long consultations with him. Lenin attributed the greatest importance to the Congress and attentively followed its proceedings.

On the eve of the conclusion of the Congress, Lenin proposed to the Left Socialist-Revolutionary Ustinov that the latter should secure the approval of the Congress for a manifesto written by Lenin. But at the evening session of the Congress, on October 22 (9), 1917, a different manifesto was adopted, entitled "To the Toiling Peasantry and the People's Army and Navy." Lenin's manifesto, considerably modified, was published on December 28 (15) in the name of the Executive Committee which had been elected by the Congress.

In the present speech Lenin deals principally with the convocation of the Constituent Assembly and the decree proclaiming the Cadets the enemies of the people. Knowing that the false hopes placed by the broad masses of the toiling peasantry in the Constituent Assembly had not yet been dissipated, Lenin, in his speech and in his draft manifesto, prepared the minds of the masses to form a correct opinion of the Constituent Assembly and its members. He argued that the Soviets were superior to the Constituent Assembly and declared that members of the Constituent Assembly who raised the standard of war against the power of the Soviets were enemies of the revolution.

He prepared the minds of the masses for the dispersal of the Constituent Assembly should it refuse to recognise the October Revolution and the Soviet government. Thus at this Congress the fight for the transfer of the leadership of the Peasants' Soviets to the proletarian government was combined with the endeavour to dissipate the "constitutional illusions" entertained by the peasant masses in relation to the Constituent Assembly. These illusions had already been completely dissipated among the working class masses. They still remained to be dissipated among the peasant masses in order to consolidate the proletarian dictatorship. It was a task closely bound up with the transfer of the leadership of the Peasants' Soviets to the proletariat and the proletarian party.

PAGE 428. The reference is to a speech of a delegate at the Second Congress of Peasants' Deputies named Moiseyev (a Social-Democrat Internationalist, closely connected with the Novaya Zhizn-ists—see note to p. 250 *), who was in the course of a speech directed against the decree of the Council of People's Commissars regarding the arrest of the Cadets at the very moment that Lenin arrived at the Congress. In the course of his speech, Moiseyev said: "What we have is not the power of the Soviets, but the power of Lenin, whom you have just applauded. . . . Ulyanov [i.e., Lenin.—Ed.] knows that if you do not agree with him he will disperse you at the point of the bayonet."

PAGE 429.* In this speech, and again in the draft manifesto of the Second All-Russian Congress of Peasants' Deputies, Lenin emphasises the fact that at the elections to the Constituent Assembly the Socialist-Revolutionary Party acted as a single unit. The Left Wing of that party—the future independent Party of Left Socialist-Revolutionaries—thanks to their petty-bourgeois nature and petty-bourgeois vacillations, hesitated to put forward their own independent lists of candidates in the elections to the Constituent Assembly and contented themselves with allowing a few of their representatives to be included in the general Socialist-Revolutionary lists. As a result, the overwhelming majority of the members of the Constituent Assembly elected on the Socialist-Revolutionary ticket consisted of Right Socialist-Revolutionaries (followers of Chernov and Avksentyev). Under the pressure of the masses of peasants and soldiers, the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries as a whole, although with certain vacillations, supported the transfer of power to the Soviets. Thus, by voting for the Socialist-Revolutionaries, the mass of the peasants were once more deceived, the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries serving as tools of the Right Socialist-Revolutionaries in this deceit. The Extraordinary Peasant Congress and the Second Peasant Congress proved that the genuine representatives of the peasants supported the Bolsheviks or the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries. Hence Lenin's demand for the recall of the members of the Constituent Assembly who had figured in the lists of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and were opposed to the Soviet power. The further course of revolutionary events and the complete dissipation of the illusions of the peasant masses in the Constituent Assembly rendered this measure superfluous.

PAGE 434.* Lenin is referring to the measures adopted by the Provisional Government against the growing revolt of the peasants on the eve of the October Revolution. The Provisional Government, with the virtual support of the Socialist-Revolutionaries, arrested peasants for participating in the agrarian movement and imprisoned members of the Land Committees because they could not cope with the peasant movement and, in some cases, even assumed the leadership of this movement. The Provisional Government resurrected Articles 269 and 341 of the tsarist Criminal Code, which provided for punishment for all who "incited to disorganisation of agriculture" and who took part in strikes of agricultural workers.

PAGE 434. The reference is to a resolution adopted by the Second All-Russian Congress of Soviets of Peasants' Deputies upon the report of the Executive Committee which had been elected by the First Congress. The Executive Committee, headed by Avksentyev and Chernov, were accused in the resolution of having betrayed the interests of the peasant masses on such fundamental questions as land, peace, form of government, etc. Accordingly, "the Second All-Russian Peasant Congress regards the activities of the majority of the Executive Committee in relation to the toiling peasantry as criminal and tending to disrupt the united front of the revolutionary army of the peasants and workers; it expresses its complete lack of confidence in the majority of the Executive Committee and elects a new Executive Committee, which is charged, in conjunction with the Central Executive Committee of the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, to put into effect the fundamental demands of the toiling peasantry on the questions of land and peace."

PAGE 437.* This speech, delivered by Lenin to the All-Russian Central Executive Committee, was a reply to the protest and interpellation of the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries on the question of the arrest of the Cadet members of the Constituent Assembly. Lenin exposed the counter-revolutionary nature of the Cadet Party and defended the decree of the Council of People's Commissars of December 11 (November 28), 1917. This decree was signed by V. Ulyanov (Lenin) as Chairman of the Council of People's Commissars, and read as follows:

"Members of the leading organs of the Party of Cadets, as enemies of the people, are liable to arrest and trial by revolutionary tribunals. The local Soviets are charged to exercise particular surveillance over the Cadet Party in view of its contacts with the Kornilovists and Kaledinites in the civil war against the revolution. This decree comes into force from the moment it is signed."

The decree was necessitated by the counter-revolutionary activities of the Cadets, who used the name of the Constituent Assembly to conceal their direct association with the counter-revolutionary generals and their virtual leadership of the counter-revolutionary movement in the South. The immediate reason for their arrest and for the issue of the decree was the counter-revolutionary demonstration organised by the Cadets on December 11 (November 28), 1917. After the demonstration a score or so of members of the Constituent Assembly—Cadets and Socialist-Revolutionaries—broke into the Taurida Palace and arbitrarily attempted to open the Constituent Assembly. The counter-revolutionary actions of the Cadets were connected with the counter-revolutionary revolt of the Kaledinites, leaders of the Don Cossacks, which had begun at that time in the South. Upon the first news of the October insurrection, Kaledin, the commander of the Don Cossacks, declared martial law in the Don Region, which very soon became a centre of counter-revolution. The blow delivered to the Cadets was a blow delivered to the forces of counter-revolution in Petrograd; it was an act in the struggle against the efforts of the bourgeoisie to organise armed action against the proletariat. The Left Socialist-Revolutionaries, because of their petty-bourgeois nature, thanks to which they failed to realise that the Mensheviks and the Right Socialist-Revolutionaries were agents of the bourgeoisie, and insisted upon their participation in the Soviet government, even now failed to see the organisation of counter-revolution in the joint activities of the Cadets and the Right Socialist-Revolutionaries. Petty-bourgeois “constitutional illusions” regarding the Constituent Assembly blinded them, as they blinded large numbers of the peasants. Lenin’s speech at the session of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee on December 14 (1), as well as the speech he delivered next day at the Second All-Russian Congress of Peasants’ Deputies (pp. 428-30 in the present volume), was designed to dissipate these illusions and prejudices of the peasants and at the same time to prepare the way for victory in the discussion of these questions at the Peasants’ Congress.

PAGE 438.* The reference is to the decree of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee of December 4 (November 21), 1917, which instituted the right to hold new elections to the Constituent Assembly “and to representative institutions generally.” The draft decree was written by Lenin and its main points were as follows:

“Congresses of Soviets of Workers’ and Soldiers’ Deputies, convened on a parity basis in the various electoral areas, are empowered to appoint new elections to all urban, rural and other representative institutions, not excluding the Constituent Assembly, upon the demand of more than one half of the electors of the constituencies concerned. The Soviets appoint the elections, and the elections themselves are to be carried out in accordance with the usual procedure on a strict basis of proportional representation. Newly-elected representatives, from the moment of their election, replace the old representatives.”

In defending this decree against the attacks of the Mensheviks at the session of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee of December 4 (November 21), 1917, Lenin pointed out, firstly, that in all countries the bourgeoisie deliberately deprived the masses of all real control over their elected representatives owing to the absence of the right of recall of deputies before the expiration of their mandates; secondly, that only in the Soviets was complete control over elected representatives guaranteed, since every delegate could be recalled by his electors at any time, irrespective of the date of the next ordinary elections; thirdly, Lenin said, "the people vote not for individuals, but for parties. The party spirit in Russia is extremely widespread, and a party has a definite political physiognomy in the eyes of the people. Hence a split in a party is bound to lead to chaos if the right of recall is not provided. The Party of Socialist-Revolutionaries enjoyed considerable influence. But a split took place after the voting lists had been drawn up. It was impossible to change the lists, just as it was impossible to postpone the Constituent Assembly. And in fact the people voted for a party which no longer existed. This was proved by the Left Second Peasants' Congress. The peasantry have been deceived not by individuals, but by a party split. This position of affairs must be corrected. There must be direct, consistent and immediate realisation of a democratic principle, viz., the institution of the right of recall."

PAGE 439.* The reference is to a speech by Chernov at the Democratic Conference (see note to p. 215 *). Influenced by the current situation, Chernov in his speech declared against a coalition with the Cadets on the grounds that they were involved with the Kornilovists.

PAGE 440.* The "Note to F. E. Dzerzhinsky" was written by Lenin in connection with a decision adopted by the Council of People's Commissars on December 20 (7), 1917, upon the report of F. E. Dzerzhinsky, to create an All-Russian Extraordinary Commission to Combat Counter-Revolution, consisting of Dzerzhinsky (chairman), Ksenofontov, Ordjonikidze, Peters, Averin, Yevseyev, Trifonov and Peterson. The formation of this Commission, which laid the foundation for one of the most important fighting organs of the proletarian dictatorship, was necessitated by the preparations for an armed attack upon the Soviet power which were being organised by the forces of counter-revolution. All the forces of the old world, from the monarchist Black Hundreds and Cadets to the Mensheviks and Right Socialist-Revolutionaries, joined this united front of counter-revolution. They were supported by the embassies and the intelligence services of the Entente powers. At first the work of the Extraordinary Commission in combating counter-revolution was confined principally to Petrograd and Moscow; but, as the counter-revolutionary movement grew and the struggle against it became more complex, the Commission set up its subsidiary bodies in the gubernias, uyezds, in the armies at the front, etc. The Commission soon after its creation uncovered a number of conspiracies against the Soviet power (e.g., the League for the Defence of the Fatherland and Freedom, the National Centre, a Polish espionage organisation, and a British espionage organisation).

Lenin's note to Dzerzhinsky was a rough draft for a decree dealing with certain preventive measures to be taken in the struggle against sabotage and counter-revolution. It reveals the importance which Lenin at that time already attached to the question. The Council of People's Commissars in December 1917 several times discussed the question of issuing a decree on combating counter-revolution. No such decree was, however, promulgated at the time. Counter-revolution was organising its forces, and experience in the fight against it was still too slight to permit definite instructions to be given in the form of a decree to guide the activities of the Extraordinary Commission.

PAGE 442.* Lenin's "Draft Decree on the Socialisation of the National Economy" and his "Draft Decree on Consumers' Communes" were written in December 1917 in connection with the labours of a special commission which had been set up by the Council of People's Commissars on December 23 (10), 1917, to draft decrees on the economic policy of the Soviet government. In Lenin's opinion, this commission was to consider the following fundamental questions: the nationalisation of the banks, compulsory trustification, the establishment of a state monopoly of foreign trade, financing of industry, food supply, the demobilisation of the army, etc. Lenin's "Draft Decree on the Socialisation of the National Economy" lays down the fundamental principles to guide the commission in the solution of the problems submitted to it, in particular the questions of the nationalisation of the banks and the establishment of a system of administration and regulation of the national economy as a whole.

The "Draft Decree on Consumers' Communes," was submitted to the consideration of a commission of the People's Commissariat for Food, where certain of its sections were supplemented and developed. It was then published in January 1918 over the signature of the People's Commissar for Food, A. G. Schlichter. Subsequently, in April 1918, it was replaced by a new decree on consumers' co-operative societies, also drawn up under Lenin's immediate supervision.

In both the "Draft Decree on the Socialisation of the National Economy" and the "Draft Decree on Consumers' Communes," Lenin develops the fundamental postulates he had laid down prior to the October Revolution (cf. the April Theses, pp. 21-26 in this volume, the theses on "The Tasks of the Proletariat in Our Revolution," pp. 45-76, "The Aims of the Revolution," pp. 240-49 and "Can the Bolsheviks Retain State Power?" pp. 250-96), but these postulates are now adapted to the circumstances of the existing situation. Both these drafts embody the fundamental direction which Lenin and the Bolshevik Party gave to the economic policy of the Soviet government in the early stages of the October Revolution.

PAGE 447.* The "Theses on the Constituent Assembly," the "Declaration of the Rights of the Toiling and Exploited People" and the speech and decree on the dissolution of the Constituent Assembly were published partly in December 1917 and partly in January 1918. They are expressive of the attitude and tactics adopted by Lenin and the Bolshevik Party towards the Constituent Assembly after the proletarian revolution had already been accomplished, and explain the reasons why the Constituent Assembly was finally prorogued on January 20 (7), 1918.

The first of these documents, the "Theses on the Constituent Assembly," was drawn up by Lenin, upon the instructions of the Central Committee of the Party, owing to the new vacillations displayed by the Rights in the Bolshevik fraction of the Constituent Assembly and in the bureau of the fraction, which included, among others, Kamenev, Larin, Ryazanov, Milyutin, Nogin, and Rykov. The Central Committee was obliged to discuss the matter after the first few meetings of the fraction, owing to the fact that the fraction "had become imbued with the sentiments of the Right Wing" and "differed with the Central Committee" on the attitude to be adopted towards the Constituent Assembly. These sentiments and this difference of opinion were so marked that Lenin at the Central Committee was obliged to move the following resolution: "1) The bureau of the fraction in the Constituent Assembly to be dissolved; 2) our attitude towards the Constituent Assembly to be explained to the fraction in the form of theses; 3) an address to the fraction to be compiled in which attention shall be drawn to the statutes of the Party, which state that all representative institutions must be subordinate to the Central Committee; 4) a member of the Central Committee to be appointed to guide the fraction; 5) statutes for the fraction to be drawn up." After this motion was discussed, the Central Committee resolved to draw up theses regarding the attitude of the Party towards the Constituent Assembly and to appoint a meeting of the fraction with the following agenda: 1) Report of the Central Committee; 2) theses; and 3) election of a new bureau. At a meeting of the fraction on December 25 (12), Lenin's theses, after a discussion, were unanimously adopted. The Rights, headed by Kamenev, rapidly submitted on this occasion. Their attitude towards the Constituent Assembly was but a corollary of the general line pursued by Kamenev in April 1917 (see the notes to pp. 31 * and 88 *), during the preparations for the October armed insurrection (see the notes to pp. 233, * 303 * and 304 *), and, immediately after the October Revolution, on the question of the composition of the Soviet government (see note to p. 412 *). Now, a month and a half after the October Revolution, they still considered that existing conditions did not favour the establishment of a proletarian dictatorship and that the Soviets must not go beyond the limits of a bourgeois-democratic revolution. They considered that the revolution could be consummated not by consolidating the power of the Soviets, but by creating "a combined type of state," made up of the Constituent Assembly and the Soviets, in which the Constituent Assembly was to play the principal part, while the Soviets were gradually to become extinct as organs of government power, and to make way for a pure "democracy," i.e., a bourgeois-democratic, and not a proletarian, state. This position was vigorously resisted by Lenin and the Central Committee of the Party.

Having thus straightened out the line of conduct of the Bolshevik fraction in the Constituent Assembly, which had been distorted by the Rights, Lenin and the Central Committee henceforward directed every stage of the work of the fraction. Lenin drew up the "Declaration of the Rights of the Toiling and Exploited People" wholly following the lines of the "Theses on the Constituent Assembly"; with certain slight amendments, this Declaration was adopted on January 17 (4) by the All-Russian Central Executive Committee for submission in the name of the latter to the Constituent Assembly, which would raise the question of the recognition by the Constituent Assembly of the Soviet government and all revolutionary measures carried out by the Soviet government in connection with the October Revolution (the principal clauses of this declaration were embodied in the Soviet Constitution adopted by the Third Congress of Soviets on January 24 [11], i.e., a few days after the dispersal of the Constituent Assembly).

The Constituent Assembly was opened on January 18 (5), 1918, on behalf of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee by Y. M. Sverdlov, who read this Declaration and expressed the hope that it would be adopted by the Assembly. This, of course, was not the case. The Declaration was not adopted, and could not have been adopted by the Constituent Assembly, of the 715 members of which only 183 were Bolsheviks and 30 Left Socialist-Revolutionaries, while the remainder consisted of Right Socialist-Revolutionary followers of Chernov and Avksentyev (about 380 seats), Mensheviks, Cadets, etc. The majority of the Constituent Assembly refused even to discuss the Declaration. In response, the Bolshevik fraction met during the recess, and after hearing a report by Lenin adopted a declaration proposed by him to be read in the name of the fraction of the R.S.D.L.P. After the recess this declaration was read and the Bolshevik fraction withdrew from the Assembly. This declaration, which Lenin, of course, intended not for the majority of the Constituent Assembly, but for the workers, and particularly the peasants, explains the withdrawal of the Bolsheviks from the Constituent Assembly in the following terms:

"Discussion lasting a whole day has clearly shown that the Party of Right Socialist-Revolutionaries are feeding the people on promises, as they did under Kerensky; they are promising them everything, but have in fact decided to combat the power of the Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Soviets and to resist the socialist measures, the transfer of the land and of all farm property to the peasants without compensation, the nationalisation of the banks and the cancellation of the state debt. Not desiring for one minute to serve as a cloak for the criminal actions of the enemies of the people, we declare that we withdraw from the Constituent Assembly in order to submit to the Soviet government the final decision on the attitude to be adopted towards the counter-revolutionary members of the Constituent Assembly."

After the withdrawal of the Bolsheviks, the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries called upon the Constituent Assembly to devote itself primarily to discussing the decrees on land and peace adopted by the Second Congress of Soviets, and when this proposal was rejected they also withdrew from the Constituent Assembly.

Shortly after the withdrawal of the Bolsheviks and Left Socialist-Revolutionaries, the guard was ordered to clear the hall of the remaining members of the Constituent Assembly. This order was countermanded by Lenin, who instead gave instructions "not to permit any acts of violence towards the counter-revolutionary members of the Constituent Assembly, to allow free exit from the Taurida Palace, but not to suffer anyone to enter the palace without special instructions." The majority of the Constituent Assembly sat until the morning of the following day, January 19 (6), when they were dispersed by the guard.

A meeting of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee was held on January 19 (6), at which Lenin proposed his "Draft Decree on the Dissolution of the Constituent Assembly" (pp. 460-62 in this volume), the arguments in support of which are contained in the speech reproduced in this volume (pp. 455-59). Lenin's proposal was adopted by the All-Russian Central Executive Committee and the Decree on the Dissolution of the Constituent Assembly was published on the morning of January 20 (7). The Right Socialist-Revolutionaries, the Mensheviks and the Cadets attempted to organise a joint protest demonstration, but of the whole population of Petrograd only a handful of counter-revolutionary intellectuals joined the ranks of the demonstrators. Neither did they meet with the sympathy of the masses in the rest of the country. Thus, Lenin's tactics towards the Constituent Assembly were strikingly corroborated.

PAGE 448.* The leading organisations in the army had been elected immediately after the February Revolution, and no elections had since taken place. The elections had been held at a time when the soldier masses, formerly deprived of all rights and crushed by the discipline prevailing in the tsarist armies, had come for the first time in their lives to participate in politics and were entirely inexperienced in the methods of the political struggle. As a result, the army organisations were filled by officers and representatives of the petty-bourgeois parties. While during the period February to October, under the influence of revolutionary events, the masses of the soldiers politically matured and became more and more revolutionary, their representatives in the army organisations, on the contrary, threw in their lot more and more definitely with the counter-revolution and parted ways with the masses. While the vast majority of the soldiers supported the Bolshevik Party, the army organisations threatened to wreak punishment on the Bolsheviks and the revolutionary masses who were preparing for a new revolution. After the October Revolution, the soldiers everywhere proceeded to drive the counter-revolutionaries out of the army organisations.

PAGE 449.* Lenin is referring to the Second Congress of the Railwaymen's Union held on January 1, 1918 (December 19, 1917), which had been summoned and the composition of which had been manipulated by the All-Russian Executive Committee of the Union of Railwaymen (Vikzhel). The Congress split into two sections over the question of recognising the Soviet government: the majority, the Socialist-Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks, advocated supporting the Constituent Assembly as against the Soviet government, while the Bolsheviks, the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries and their sympathisers withdrew from the Congress and proclaimed themselves an Extraordinary All-Russian Railwaymen's Congress. This Extraordinary Congress dealt with a number of important questions concerning the organisation of transport, the position of railway employees, etc. This Congress also elected a new executive body of the union—the Vikzhedor.

PAGE 449.  Lenin is referring to the fact that the toiling masses of the subject nationalities of Russia had begun to come over to the side of the Soviet government, which, of course, implied that they were liberating themselves from the leadership of the petty-bourgeois parties (the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks). These parties, when they shared power with the bourgeoisie, had done nothing to emancipate the nationalities which had been oppressed by the tsars. This was done by the October Revolution when it proclaimed the right of the nations to self-determination, including the right to secession. This gained for the triumphant proletariat and the Soviet government the sympathies of the toiling masses of the oppressed nationalities. A Soviet government was set up in the Ukraine against the petty-bourgeois Ukrainian Rada (a government which played the same part in the Ukraine as Kerensky's government in the rest of the country). The Rada fled, but returned in December with the support of Austrian and German bayonets. In Finland the working class seized the power of government; and it was only with the aid of German bayonets that the Finnish bourgeoisie, in the beginning of 1918, succeeded in drowning the Finnish revolution in blood. The Finnish bourgeoisie showed no respect for the democratic Diet of Finland, the majority of the members of which belonged to the workers' party. In White Russia, the "Socialist Gromada (parliament)" was opposed by the Soviets. In the Caucasus—Georgia, Armenia and Azerbaijan—the Mensheviks and the bourgeois parties succeeded in establishing a government only with the aid of foreign troops. A Soviet power was established in Turkestan at the time of the October Revolution in Central Russia. The Soviet power in Turkestan managed to preserve itself even when the latter was entirely cut off from Russia. Attempts to create a bourgeois government in Kokand were quickly suppressed.

PAGE 449. The reference is to the rebellion organised by the Cadets and General Kaledin on the Don, for which see note to p. 437.*

PAGE 451.* The "few Bolshevik leaders" here referred to were the Rights, headed by Kamenev, Zinoviev and Rykov (see note to p. 447 *).

PAGE 453.* Finland under the tsars, while forming part of the Russian Empire, enjoyed formal autonomy, but systematically suffered from tsarist arbitrariness. The policy of oppression in relation to Finland was continued by the Provisional Government, which dispersed the Diet when the latter attempted to proclaim Finland's independence. In November 1917, Lenin handed the head of the Finnish government a decree of the Council of People's Commissars recognising the independence of Finland and her separation from Russia.

Northern Persia was occupied by the tsarist government during the imperialist war under the pretext of defending her against Turkey. After the revolution of February 1917 no changes in policy towards the Oriental peoples were made by the Provisional Government, which continued to maintain troops in Northern Persia. It was not until after the October Revolution that the Russian army of occupation was withdrawn from Northern Persia upon the orders of the Soviet government.

Practically the same thing happened in the case of Armenia. During the imperialist war the tsarist government, which ruthlessly oppressed the small nationalities forming part of the Russian Empire, including the Armenians, came forward as the emancipator of the Armenians from the yoke of Turkey. Its real purpose was to seize Turkish territory, a policy which was continued by the Provisional Government. The Soviet government repudiated this policy of aggrandisement and proclaimed the right of self-determination of the Armenian people irrespective of the territory they occupied.

PAGE 455.* It was not until after the February Revolution that the Cadets came out as a republican party. Their purpose was to deceive the toiling masses and win their sympathies. Ever since the First Congress of the Cadet Party in 1905 their programme had contained a demand for the transformation of Russia into a constitutional monarchy. And when in 1917 they adopted republican colours they in fact remained monarchists. They strove at first to establish the personal dictatorship of the monarchist Kornilov. After the October Revolution they proclaimed the Constituent Assembly to be the sole organ of sovereign power. In the Don Region they led the counter-revolutionary attack of the monarchist General Kaledin, the second candidate for the post of dictator.

PAGE 458.* The Smolny Institute was the headquarters of the Petrograd Soviet of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, the All-Russian Central Executive Committee and the Council of People's Commissars—the organs of the triumphant proletarian revolution and dictatorship, while the Taurida Palace was at that time the meeting place of the Constituent Assembly—the organ of moribund bourgeois democracy.

PAGE 463.* The article "The Elections to the Constituent Assembly and the Dictatorship of the Proletariat," as also the articles that follow it in this volume—"The Anniversary of the Revolution," "The Fourth Anniversary of the October Revolution," and "Our Revolution"—were written at various times during the years 1919-23. They are nevertheless reproduced in this volume for the reason that they are all devoted to the October Revolution: they deal with the tactics pursued during that revolution, the relation of forces in the revolution, as well as the character and consequences of the revolution. Furthermore, they contain a number of general conclusions drawn from the experience of the October Revolution, conclusions which have become embodied in Lenin's theory of proletarian revolution. It should be said that these articles, taken in conjunction with certain other writings reproduced in Vols. V and VI of the Selected Works (e.g., "Imperialism, the Highest Stage of Capitalism," "The United States of Europe Slogan," "The Two Lines of the Revolution," Chap. V of the article "A Caricature of Marxism and 'Imperialist Economism,'" Chap. X of "The Discussion on Self-Determination Summed Up," the theses in "The Tasks of the Proletariat in the Present Revolution" and in "The Tasks of the Proletariat in Our Revolution," "Letters on Tactics," and "Can the Bolsheviks Retain State Power?"), present a finished statement of Lenin's theory of proletarian revolution and form an exhaustive theoretical commentary on the Russian October Revolution.

The article "The Elections to the Constituent Assembly and the Dictatorship of the Proletariat" was written for the Communist International and published in No. 7-8 of November-December 1919, at a time when the main fronts of the Civil War (the Denikin front and the Kolchak front) had already been liquidated. Hence the subject of the conquest of power by the proletariat and the establishment of its dictatorship are in this article closely associated with the successes achieved on these principal fronts of the Civil War and the resultant strengthening of the proletarian dictatorship. Moreover, the central subject of the article—the political conditions for the proletarian revolution—is here treated from the point of view of the conditions that made for the stability of the proletarian revolution. This article, like all the articles enumerated above, criticises the views of the opportunists on these conditions. In particular, Lenin exposes in this article the deception practised on the proletariat in the propaganda by the opportunists of all countries of the idea that the rule of the proletariat can be established merely as the result of winning a majority in bourgeois representative institutions (Constituent Assemblies, parliaments, etc.) and that the strength of the forces possessed by the proletariat and the proletarian party in the struggle for the conquest of power can be gauged by the number of votes cast in the elections to these institutions.

The articles enumerated above, which were written before the present article, explain what are the objective conditions which in the era of imperialism give rise to a revolutionary crisis, or, as it is called, a revolutionary situation, and what must be done by a proletarian party to transform a revolutionary situation into a revolution. Articles written by Lenin immediately before the October Revolution (see, in particular, "The Crisis Has Matured" and "Can the Bolsheviks Retain State Power?" pp. 224-32 and 250-96 in this volume) showed that the revolutionary situation in Russia already existed and that it would depend upon the Party, upon its correct application of Marxian tactics, whether that situation would be transformed into a real revolution. In the present article Lenin explains the conditions under which this transformation takes place in practice. If you do not drop a thing, it will not fall, Lenin says on the subject of a revolutionary situation in his pamphlet Left-Wing Communism, an Infantile Disorder, written in 1920. Drawing on the experience of the October Revolution, Lenin in the present article shows how the proletariat can "drop" the bourgeoisie when a revolutionary situation exists, when a revolutionary crisis has matured. The conditions which in a revolutionary situation are necessary for the victory of the proletariat are that the revolutionary proletarian party shall win a majority of the proletariat away from the petty-bourgeois parties; that this majority in the principal industrial centres of the country (in the case of Russia, in the "capitals") shall be transformed into a "mighty striking force"; that a "political striking force" shall be created in the army and that a supremely courageous revolutionary assault shall be delivered against the bourgeoisie at a properly chosen moment when the revolutionary crisis has been rendered most acute. Lenin's postulates, which in the present article are forcefully contrasted with the views of the opportunists regarding the conquest of political rule by the proletariat, have now become the A B C of the tactics of the Communist Parties, which are leading the proletariat to the establishment of its dictatorship in the capitalist countries. The conditions which make for the stability of the success of the proletariat and the stability of its dictatorship are: that the semi-proletarian and non-proletarian toiling masses shall be won away from the petty-bourgeois parties; that the sympathy and support first of the poor peasants and then of the middle peasants shall be won for the proletariat in its fight against the resistance of the bourgeoisie, and that the sympathy and support of the toilers of oppressed nations shall be gained by means of a correct national policy. These postulates are strikingly set forth by Lenin in the present article against the background of the experience of the October Revolution, and have, in their turn, also become determining factors in the tactics of the Communist Parties of all countries. The possibility of the proletariat's gaining the sympathy and support of the backward toiling and exploited masses is created by the same objective conditions as give rise to a revolutionary situation. But, here again, it depends upon the proletariat and its party to transform this possibility into a reality. In an earlier article, "The Great Initiative," written in 1919, Lenin says:

"The vast majority of the population of any capitalist country, Russia included—and still more of the toiling population—have in their own experience and the experience of their near ones suffered the oppression of capital, have been robbed and subjected to all manner of indignity by it. The imperialist war—i.e., the slaughter of tens of millions of people for the sake of determining whether British or German capital shall enjoy primacy in plundering the world—has to an extraordinary degree aggravated, widened, and intensified these sufferings and has forced people to examine them. Hence, the vast majority of the population, and particularly of the toiling masses, inevitably sympathise with the proletariat for the reason that the latter with such heroic courage and revolutionary ruthlessness overthrows the yoke of capital, overthrows the exploiters, smashes their reali-tance, and sheds its own blood in order to lay the way for the creation of a new society in which there will be no place for exploiters."

Heroic courage in the revolutionary assault on the bourgeoisie and supreme boldness of initiative on the part of the proletariat, and particularly of its vanguard, the Party; the overthrow of the bourgeoisie; the establishment of the proletarian dictatorship and the determined revolutionary measures taken by the proletariat for the emancipation of the toilers from oppression of all kinds, oppression of the peasants by the landlords, oppression of small nationalities, etc.—all these we find enumerated also in the present article as decisive factors in winning for the proletariat the sympathy of the majority of the toilers and exploited, in obtaining for the industrial proletariat the wholehearted support of the agricultural workers and poor peasants and, finally, in creating during the transition period an alliance between the proletariat and the poor peasants on the one hand and the middle peasants on the other.

In the theses on the agrarian question which later, in 1920, he drew up for the Second Congress of the Communist International, Lenin wrote:

"The agricultural population of all the three above-mentioned categories [i.e., the agricultural proletariat, the dwarf peasant, analogous to the Russian poor peasant, and the small peasant, analogous to the Russian middle peasant.—Ed.]—who are monstrously downtrodden, disunited, crushed, and doomed to semi-barbarian conditions of existence in all, even the most advanced, countries—being economically, socially and culturally interested in the triumph of socialism, are capable of determinedly supporting the revolutionary proletariat only after the latter has conquered political power, only after it has resolutely disposed of the large landlords and capitalists, and only after these downtrodden people see, realise in practice, that they have an organised leader and defender, powerful and determined enough to help and lead and to point out the right path to follow. . . . This truth has been fully proved theoretically by Marxism and fully corroborated by the experience of the proletarian revolution in Russia."

In the present article, "The Elections to the Constituent Assembly and the Dictatorship of the Proletariat," also written for the Communist Parties of capitalist countries, Lenin demonstrates this truth from the experience of the proletarian revolution in Russia when he speaks of "the relation of the proletariat to the non-proletarian toiling masses." This, however, as pointed out in the note to p. 425,* does not mean that during the October Revolution the poor peasants did not support the seizure of power by the proletariat. The political "striking force" in the army, of which Lenin speaks in this article as one of the most important factors in the success of the October Revolution, was in itself an expression of the alliance between the proletariat and the poor peasants. And if, nevertheless, Lenin in this article and in his theses on the agrarian question drawn up for the Second Congress of the Communist International declares, in reference to the experience of the October Revolution, that the determined support of the above enumerated categories of the agricultural population, and hence of the poor peasants, can be secured only under the dictatorship of the proletariat, what he has in mind is the final consolidation of the support given by the poor peasants to the revolutionary proletariat, the transformation of the poor peasants into the bulwark of the proletariat in the countryside, and, with the help of this bulwark, the creation of a firm alliance with the middle peasants. Thanks to the Leninist policy pursued by the Party on the agrarian and peasant question, the support given by the poor peasants to the proletariat in the October Revolution guaranteed an attitude of benevolent neutrality on the part of the middle peasants towards the seizure of power by the proletariat. Moreover, it gained for the proletariat and the Bolshevik Party the support of the peasantry as a whole during and after the October Revolution—of course, only to the extent that we carried the bourgeois revolution to completion. Speaking of the support of “the peasantry as a whole,” to which Lenin in his articles and speeches repeatedly refers, Stalin in his article “The Slogan of the Dictatorship of the Proletariat and the Poor Peasantry in the Period of Preparation for October” writes:

“... Why did we succeed in securing the support of the peasantry as a whole in October and after October? Because we were in a position to complete the bourgeois revolution. Why were we able to do this? Because we were able to overthrow the power of the bourgeoisie and replace it by the power of the proletariat, which alone is able to complete the bourgeois revolution. Why were we able to overthrow the power of the bourgeoisie and set up the power of the proletariat? Because we prepared for October under the slogan of the dictatorship of the proletariat and the poor peasantry, because, proceeding from this slogan, we waged a systematic struggle against the compromising tactics of the petty-bourgeois parties, because, proceeding from this slogan, we waged a systematic struggle against the vacillation of the middle peasants in the Soviets, and because only with the aid of this slogan we were able to overcome the vacillations of the middle peasant, defeat the compromising tactics of the petty-bourgeois parties and assemble a political army capable of conducting the struggle for the transfer of power to the proletariat. It need hardly be shown that without these preliminary conditions, which determined the fate of the October Revolution, we should not have obtained the support of the peasantry as a whole either during or after October.” (Stalin, Leninism, Vol. I.)

All this must be borne in mind when studying Lenin's article “The Elections to the Constituent Assembly and the Dictatorship of the Proletariat.”

This article is of paramount theoretical and practical importance. Its basic propositions form an integral part of Lenin's theory of the proletarian revolution. They served, and still serve, as fundamental political guides for the Parties of the Communist International and are embodied in the programme of the International.

PAGE 469.* The reference is to the bargaining conducted after the October Revolution by the leaders of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks through the intermediary of the Executive Committee of the All-Russian Union of Railwaymen (Vikzhel), and by the Left Socialist-Revolutionaries directly, for the creation of a coalition government made up of all the "Socialist" parties (see the notes to pp. 412,* 413,* and 416 **).

PAGE 469. Lenin is referring to a letter written by Marx to Kugelmann on December 13, 1870, in which Marx, referring to the victories of the Prussian armies in the Franco-Prussian War, says: "But, however the war may end, it has given the French proletariat practice in arms, and that is the best guarantee of the future." (Marx, Letters to Dr. Kugelmann.)

PAGE 480.* The reference is presumably to the All-Russian Party Conference held in December 1919, which discussed among other questions the situation of the Soviet government in the Ukraine. A conflict took place at the Conference with the "Left" deviationists on the national question, who, as before (e.g., at the Party Conference in April 1917 and at the Eighth Party Congress in 1919), accused Lenin of "attaching undue importance" to the national question—in the present case to the Ukrainian question. In his turn, Lenin severely criticised the "Left" deviationists for having underestimated the importance of the national question and thereby undermined the alliance between the workers and toiling peasants and facilitated the fall of the Soviet power in the Ukraine at the beginning of 1919. The Conference on this question unanimously adopted the following resolution proposed by the C.C. of the Party:

"1) Undeviatingly adhering to the principle of the self-determination of nations, the Central Committee considers it necessary once more to affirm that the Russian Communist Party stands for the recognition of the independence of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic.

"2) Considering that for every Communist and every class conscious worker the necessity of maintaining the closest possible union between all the Soviet republics in their conflict with the menacing forces of world imperialism is beyond all dispute, the Russian Communist Party holds the position that the determination of the form of that union will be finally made by the Ukrainian workers and toiling peasants."

The resolution goes on to emphasise the necessity of facilitating "the removal of all obstacles to the free development of the Ukrainian language and culture." "Since," the resolution states, "owing to centuries of oppression, nationalist tendencies are to be observed among the backward sections of the Ukrainian masses, it is incumbent on members of the Russian Communist Party to observe an attitude of extreme tolerance and tact towards them and to counteract these tendencies by explaining in a comradely manner the identity of the interests of the toiling masses of the Ukraine and of Russia." The resolution at the same time pointed to the necessity of combating the kulaks and of abolishing the landed estates restored by Denikin and handing these estates over to peasants who owned little or no land.

PAGE 480. In 1917 the Ukrainian Socialist-Revolutionaries separated from the Russian Socialist-Revolutionaries to form an independent organisation.

They put forward their own lists of candidates in the elections to the Constituent Assembly. After the October Revolution, the Ukrainian Socialist-Revolutionaries, like the Russian Socialist-Revolutionaries, were hostile to the Soviets. But they were also hostile to the dominant-nation attitude of the Russian Socialist-Revolutionaries. They were distinguished from the latter also by the fact that they placed their hopes in Germany, rather than in the Entente. The Ukrainian Socialist-Revolutionaries concluded a peace with Germany independently of Soviet Russia. The Ukrainian Central Rada, controlled by Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries, was driven out of the Ukraine by the insurgent workers and the Red Army, and returned to Kiev only with the support of German and Austrian bayonets. But it was the German military command that once more overthrew the Ukrainian Rada and replaced it by the Black Hundred government of Skoropadsky. In this particular passage in his article, Lenin, referring to the split among the Socialist-Revolutionaries along national lines and to the fact that the Ukrainian petty-bourgeois parties secured a majority in the elections to the Constituent Assembly, emphasises the importance and complexity of the national question. These lines are directed against those Communists who were indifferent to the national question, and point to the need for a more tactful attitude towards the nationally-minded masses of the toiling peasantry. Lenin similarly criticised the "Lefts" on the national question at the Party Conference of April 1917, at the Eighth Party Congress and at the Party Conference of December 1919 (see the preceding note).

PAGE 483.* Lenin is here referring to the experience of the revolution in Finland at the beginning of 1918. The revolution was led by the Finnish Social-Democrats among whom genuine revolutionary Communists, schooled in Marxian theory, had not yet come to the fore. The revolution was fought on behalf of democracy and not for the establishment of the dictatorship of the proletariat. The Council of People's Deputies created in the revolution was concerned with drawing up a bourgeois-democratic constitution and not with organising the fighting forces of the proletariat for the establishment and defence of the proletarian dictatorship. As Kuusinen points out in his book The Revolution in Finland, the leaders of the Finnish proletariat were convinced that, having obtained a majority in parliament by peaceful means, the proletariat could set about transforming the bourgeois state into a socialist society. This point of view tied the working class hand and foot. But the Finnish bourgeoisie discarded democracy as an unnecessary incubus, joined forces with the German and Russian White Guards and launched an armed attack on the working class. Only in the course of this struggle did the proletariat forsake its democratic illusions. It proceeded to seize the factories, organise a Red Army, close down the bourgeois newspapers, and so on. But the Finnish proletariat was defeated in its heroic struggle. The savage reign of White Terror which followed the suppression of the proletarian revolution claimed thousands of working class victims.

The experience of Finland was one more corroboration of the correctness of the revolutionary strategy and tactics of the Bolshevik Party, particularly in relation to bourgeois democracy. The mistakes of the Finnish revolution and the experience of that revolution and of the Russian October Revolution were carefully analysed by a conference of the Finnish workers' party held in Moscow in August 1918.

PAGE 485.* One expression of "the recognition of the dictatorship of the proletariat in word" by the German Independent Social-Democrats (led by Kautsky, Haase, Hilferding and Ledebour) was their congress held in March 1919, where under the influence of the rising revolutionary movement of the proletariat they declared themselves in favour of the transformation of the Soviets which had sprung up in Germany at that time into organs of government power, but only as appendages to the bourgeois parliament. Similarly, in April of the same year the Independent Social-Democratic fraction at the German Second Congress of Soviets moved a resolution and proposed draft "directives" which advocated the transfer "of the entire political power" to the Soviets and their Congress. Referring to the March resolution of the congress of German Independents, Lenin in 1919, in an article entitled "The Heroes of the Berne International," wrote:

"This attempt to reconcile the dictatorship of the bourgeoisie with the dictatorship of the proletariat represents an utter rejection of Marxism and of socialism in general. It ignores the experience of the Russian Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries, who, in the period from May 19 (6), 1917, to November 7 (October 25), 1917, tried the experiment of combining the Soviets, as 'state organisations,' with the bourgeois state, an experiment which ended in miserable failure."

And in reference to the resolution of the Independents at the Second German Congress of Soviets advocating the transfer of the entire political power to the Soviets, Lenin summed up the whole policy of the Independents, as follows:

"We see, consequently, that the 'Independent' leaders have proved themselves to be wretched philistines utterly dependent upon the vulgar prejudices of the most backward section of the proletariat. In the autumn of 1918, these leaders, through the mouth of Kautsky, absolutely rejected the idea of transforming the Soviets into state organisations. In March 1919 they abandon this position and follow in the wake of the working class masses. In April 1919 they refute the decision of their own congress and completely adopt the position of the Communists, demanding 'All power to the Soviets.' Such leaders are not worth much. . . . They are not to be trusted."

Lenin proved to be right. When the German proletariat was defeated, the Independent leaders, who at the height of the struggle in 1919 had verbally favoured a Soviet government, in practice betrayed the proletariat, and, discarding the slogan of a Soviet government, deserted to the Social-Democrat Noske, the "bloody hound" of the bourgeoisie, who crushed the proletarian movement. When, by the vote of their more advanced working class section, the Independents at their congress in Leipzig at the end of 1919, and again at their congress in Halle in 1920, decided to withdraw from the Second International and join the Communist International, Kautsky and his group split away and in 1921 joined the Two-and-a-Half International (see note to p. 503 *), which was distinguished from the Second International only by its use of "Marxist" phrases. Subsequently, the Independents, with the exception of a small group headed by Ledebour, united with the majority of the German Social-Democratic Party and in 1923 returned to the fold of the Second International.

The Longuetists, who in 1918 occupied a position approximating to that of the German Independents, were members of the French Socialist Party. When that party, at its congress held in Tours in 1920, decided by a majority vote to join the Communist International, the Longuetists split away and, like the German Independents, moving more and more to the Right, finally became the avowed enemies of the Communist International and the Soviets.

PAGE 486.* The speech on "The Anniversary of the Revolution" was delivered by Lenin on November 6, 1918, at the Sixth Congress of Soviets, while the article "The Fourth Anniversary of the October Revolution" was written by him in October 1921 and appeared in Pravda of October 31. They are reproduced in this volume for reasons already stated in the note to p. 463.* The article which precedes them in this volume, "The Elections to the Constituent Assembly and the Dictatorship of the Proletariat," drawing on the experience of the October Revolution, describes the relation of forces and the tactics of the Communist Party in the proletarian revolution. The speech on the first anniversary of the revolution, on the other hand, summarises the experience of the first year of the proletarian dictatorship and analyses the importance of the changes effected during that period, in particular the transition accomplished during that year, under the leadership of the proletariat and the Communist Party, from "the general struggle of the peasants for land" to the struggle of "the most oppressed section of the rural population" against the bourgeoisie, and particularly the kulak bourgeoisie. It also deals with the international significance of the consolidation in that year of the Soviet republic as the "genuine home of the world socialist revolution."

The speech on the first anniversary of the revolution is closely akin to the article "The Fourth Anniversary of the October Revolution." The October proletarian revolution in Russia signalised the transformation of the bourgeois-democratic revolution into the proletarian socialist revolution. The October Revolution was a socialist revolution of the proletariat headed by the Bolshevik Party which "in passing" solved all the problems left unsolved by the bourgeois-democratic revolution.

Lenin deals with this subject in a number of other articles and speeches and repeatedly points out that the October Revolution was a peculiar combination of the proletarian revolution and the peasant war, that it was a peculiar fusion of the proletarian revolution with the peasantry against the bourgeoisie.

In his book Leninism Stalin says:

"No one denies that one of the chief aims of the October Revolution was to complete the bourgeois revolution, that the latter could not have been completed without the October Revolution, just as the October Revolution itself could not have been consolidated without the bourgeois revolution having been completed; and that, inasmuch as the October Revolution completed the bourgeois revolution, it could not but meet with the sympathy of all the peasants. All that is undeniable. But can it for this reason be asserted that the completion of the bourgeois revolution was not a derivative of the October Revolution, but its essential feature, its chief aim? What then becomes of the chief aim of the October Revolution, namely, the overthrow of the power of the bourgeoisie, the establishment of the dictatorship of the proletariat, the transformation of the imperialist war into civil war, the expropriation of the capitalists, etc.? And if the main theme of a strategic slogan is the basic question of every revolution, i.e., the question of the transfer of power from one class to another class, is it not obvious that the question of the completion of the bourgeois revolution by the proletarian power must not be confused with the question of the overthrow of the bourgeoisie and the winning of that proletarian power, i.e., with the question that represented the main theme of the strategic slogan of the second stage of the revolution" (i.e., the slogan of an alliance of the dictatorship of the proletariat with the poor peasantry.—Ed.). (Stalin, Leninism, Vol. I, "The Three Basic Slogans of the Party on the Peasant Question.")

Because the "completion of the bourgeois revolution" was a "derivative of the October Revolution," a by-product of the accomplishment of the fundamental socialist aim of that revolution—the overthrow of the power of the bourgeoisie—there is not, as Stalin points out in his replies to Yan—sky and Pokrovsky, any discrepancy between this "completion of the bourgeois revolution" and the support in completing this bourgeois revolution that was given to the proletariat by the peasantry as a whole during and after the October Revolution and the fact that "we prepared for October under the slogan of the dictatorship of the proletariat and the poor peasantry."

It is obvious that the opportunist mistakes of certain members of the Bolshevik Party exposed by Stalin in the above-mentioned replies to Yan—sky and Pokrovsky, mistakes which in spite of this exposure were repeated later, "bring grist to the mill of counter-revolutionary Trotskyism and Trotskyist contraband." The false Trotskyist interpretation of the character of the October Revolution, which is combined with an equally false and slanderous interpretation of Lenin's views on the October Revolution, was most glaringly expressed by Trotsky himself, particularly in his counter-revolutionary book The Permanent Revolution and the Line of Lenin (Berlin, 1930). Trotsky, by unscrupulously juggling quotations from Lenin, transforms the completion of the bourgeois revolution from a "by-product" of the October Revolution into the main achievement of that revolution and, in common with all social-fascists, declares that the October Revolution was a bourgeois revolution and the dictatorship of the proletariat a democratic dictatorship. True, he makes the hypocritical reservation that "within a few months" that dictatorship "began to grow into a socialist dictatorship." But we know the value of that reservation, for we are acquainted with Trotsky's libellous accusation of a Soviet Thermidor, i.e., the bourgeois degeneration of the Soviet state and the Bolshevik Party.

Akin to this opportunist interpretation of the function of the October Revolution exposed by Stalin in his replies to Yan—sky and Pokrovsky is Bukharin's Right opportunist theory that the combination of the proletarian revolution and the peasant war was a mechanical combination, a theory most clearly expressed in his speech on "Lenin's Political Testament."

This theory is also alien to Lenin's conception of the "combination" of the proletarian revolution and the peasant war in the October Revolution, as a result of which the problems of the peasant war were solved as a "by-product" of the October Revolution. Bukharin conceives of two separate revolutions, the proletarian and the peasant, moving along parallel paths. Moreover, according to Bukharin, this double revolution continued down to the reconstruction period of the New Economic Policy. In his speech on "Lenin's Political Testament," Bukharin declared that even at that time (1929) the main thing was "to take care of the combination of the 'proletarian' revolution and the 'peasant war' in a new form, on this occasion a 'construction form'!" But Bukharin's peasant war is the war of the whole peasantry, and Bukharin's care therefore was that the construction of socialism by the proletarian dictatorship should be undertaken in conjunction with the whole peasantry, and hence with the kulaks too. It follows from Bukharin's position that the alliance of the proletariat with the peasantry is the same during the struggle for the overthrow of the landlords, during the Civil War against the counter-revolution, and during the construction of socialism. That indeed is what he says in his pamphlet The Path to Socialism and the Workers' and Peasants' Alliance:

"We shall triumph finally, we shall triumph utterly and completely, we shall indeed build a new society of toil [he means, presumably, a socialist society.—Ed.] only if we succeed in these new conditions of peace in consolidating that alliance between the working class and the peasantry which guaranteed our success during the course of the whole of our revolution."

Hence, according to Bukharin, "the path to socialism" will be laid by the proletariat in conjunction with the kulak, who "all the same has nowhere to go" and who therefore will enter socialism by way of co-operation in one form or another (Bukharin accordingly makes the credit co-operatives the preserve of the kulaks).

Lenin's article "The Fourth Anniversary of the October Revolution" describes and theoretically explains the October Revolution in its subsequent phases down to the period of the New Economic Policy. It serves as a rebuttal of all the opportunist interpretations of the October Revolution—from the counter-revolutionary interpretation of Trotsky to the Right opportunist interpretation of Bukharin—as well as of the no less opportunist theories of, for instance, Zinoviev (see his book Leninism), which assert that the New Economic Policy was the continuation of the growth of the bourgeois-democratic revolution into the socialist revolution.

The article "The Fourth Anniversary of the October Revolution" is a finished statement of Lenin's theory of the growth of the bourgeois-democratic revolution into the socialist revolution. In this finished form it is embodied in the programme of the Communist International adopted at the Fourth Congress (Chap. IV, Section 8) and is one of the guiding principles of the tactics of the Communist International in relation to the revolutions in the colonial and semi-colonial countries.

PAGE 503.* The Two-and-a-Half International, or the Vienna International, was officially known as the International Alliance of Socialist Parties. It was founded in Vienna in February 1921 at a conference of Socialist parties which had temporarily left the Second International, but which had not joined the Communist International. Among them were the remnants of the German Independent Socialist Party, headed by Kautsky and Hilferding (see note to p. 485 *), the British Independent Labour Party and the Swiss Socialist Party, upon the initiative of which parties the conference was called. The Two-and-a-Half International was under the control of Centrists of the type represented by Kautsky during the war. Its aim was to counteract the growing influence of the Communist International among the working class masses. While verbally admitting the possibility of the conquest of power by the proletariat with the aid of an armed insurrection, and, in the event of "sabotage" on the part of the bourgeoisie, of the establishment of a proletarian dictatorship, the Two-and-a-Half International in actual fact served to cover the betrayal of the working class by the Social-Democrats and by the Centrists of all the Socialist parties during the war. The Two-and-a-Half International terminated its existence in May 1923 by merging with the Second International.

PAGE 506.* Regarding the Basle Manifesto of 1912, cf. Lenin, Selected Works, Vol. V, "The Collapse of the Second International," Chaps. I and II. The "new Basle Manifestoes" refers to the hypocritical resolutions on the war passed at the first post-war international conference of the Second International, which was held in Berne in February 1919, and which was attended by Centrists and avowed social-chauvinists, and also to the resolutions passed by the Two-and-a-Half International at its inaugural conference in February 1921 (see note to p. 503.*).

PAGE 509.* The article "Our Revolution," printed in Pravda of May 30, 1923, was written in January of that year. This extremely important theoretical article deals with the preliminary conditions which are necessary for a socialist revolution, as shown by the experience of the October Revolution. It was written in connection with the book of a prominent Menshevik, a former Novaya-Zhizn-ist (see note to p. 250 *), N. Sukhanov, entitled Notes on the Revolution. This book reproduces the usual Menshevik conception of the proletarian revolution in general, and of the Russian October Revolution in particular, and declares that the social and economic conditions for a socialist revolution did not exist in Russia.

This prejudice, common to all Russian and European Mensheviks, i.e., to all the parties of the Second International, and borrowed from them in 1917 by the Right deviationists in the Party (Kamenev, Zinoviev, etc.) and by the Trotskyists, is dissected by Lenin in the present article. Lenin's arguments are drawn from the experience of the Russian revolution and are in conformity with his general views on the proletarian revolution. The Russian revolution proved that the proletariat can seize power and build up socialism in a comparatively backward capitalist country. Marx and Engels, in Chap. IV of The Class Struggles in France (a chapter written by them jointly), had pointed out that the proletarian revolution might and in fact would begin not in the most highly developed but in comparatively feebly developed capitalist countries. They wrote:

"If the crises first produce revolutions on the Continent, the foundation for these is, nevertheless, always laid in England. Violent outbreaks must naturally occur earlier in the extremities of the bourgeois body than in its heart, since here the possibility of adjustment is greater than there."

England at that time (the middle of the nineteenth century) was the most highly developed of capitalist countries, "the heart of capitalism." It was in England that the economic crises began. But Marx and Engels expected that the "violent outbreak" of the crisis, its first transformation into a proletarian revolution, would take place not in the "heart" of capitalism, England, but in "the extremities" of the bourgeois body, in the comparatively feebly developed capitalist countries of Europe. Only then, according to the view held by Marx and Engels, would the proletarian revolution, begun on the Continent, be consummated in England, the heart of capitalism. The idea of Marx and Engels that the proletarian revolution "naturally occurs earlier" in "the extremities of the bourgeois body" received its final development at the hands of Lenin—in particular in the present article, "Our Revolution"—and took the form of the idea that not only was it possible for the proletarian revolution to begin in capitalist countries more feebly developed than England, but also that it was possible under certain conditions, explained by Lenin, for the proletarian revolution to be firmly established and for the triumphant proletariat to build up socialism in a single country. During the imperialist war and prior to the Revolution of 1917 in Russia, Lenin had argued (see Selected Works, Vol. V, "The United States of Europe Slogan") that the "uneven economic and political development" of various countries in the era of imperialism creates the possibility of "the victory of socialism [of socialism, mark you, and not merely of a proletarian revolution, in the sense of the act of seizure of power by the proletariat, as Trotsky and his followers presume] first in a few or even in one single capitalist country taken separately." While, according to Marx and Engels, the proletarian revolution breaks out first in a comparatively feebly developed country, it becomes possible in the era of imperialism, owing to the extremely uneven development of the various countries, for such a country to proceed from a successful act of proletarian revolution to the successful upbuilding of socialism. Marx and Engels considered the general crisis of capitalism, which begins at its heart, a necessary condition for a "violent outbreak" in the extremities of the bourgeois body. The era of imperialism is the era of the general crisis of capitalism. This crisis assumes extreme form either in the shape of imperialist wars or in the shape of acute world economic crises, such as the world crisis that started in 1929, which, be it noted, began at the heart of modern world capitalism, the U.S.A. Because it is the era of the general crisis of capitalism, and because the whole capitalist world is rent by its contradictions, imperialism, as Lenin pointed out in various writings during the war, becomes the era of proletarian revolutions. The unevenness of the economic and political development of capitalism under imperialism causes unevenness in the development of the bourgeoisie in the various countries and in the power of its resistance to the general crisis of capitalism and to the onslaughts of the proletariat which take place at the most acute moments of the crisis. It also results in an unequal ability on the part of bourgeois countries to find a temporary solution for the economic and class contradictions that rend them. "Weak links" appear in the general chain of capitalism, and, as Stalin pointed out in his reports to the Fourteenth Congress and Fifteenth Conference of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and to the Seventh Plenum of the Executive Committee of the Communist International, in which Lenin's doctrine of the possibility of the success of the proletarian revolution and of socialism in a single country is brilliantly developed, the chain of imperialism may break at one of these weak links. Under imperialism both highly developed countries may prove to be such weak links (e.g., Germany in 1918-20 and 1923-24) and comparatively feebly developed countries, in which the bourgeoisie is weak—also comparatively, of course—and in which economic and class antagonisms are particularly acute, complex and involved (as was the case in Russia, where the contradictions of capitalism were interwoven with the contradictions of the pre-capitalist system, with the relics of feudalism). And if in such a country the proletariat, although representing a minority of the population, is already a force, already possesses a strong revolutionary party and is able to extend its influence over the poor peasants (as again was the case in Russia), it has the possibility not only of seizing power, but also of retaining power, notwithstanding the opportunist prejudice that before it can do so it must constitute a majority of the population. When the chain has been broken at one of the weak links of imperialism, and the proletariat, having come to power, is able because of the correctness of the policy pursued by its revolutionary party to win over to its side a majority of the toilers of the country (by forming an alliance with the middle peasants, while making the poor peasants its main support), the specific features of imperialism make it possible for the proletariat to march forward towards socialism. The proletariat, once it has come to power, can take advantage of the antagonisms which rend its enemies, the imperialists of the various countries, in order, with the support and sympathy of the international proletariat, to put down counter-revolution and to secure "breathing-spaces" of long or short duration, during which it can carry on the internal work of construction, take possession of the key positions in the economic life of the country, enhance those feeble material and cultural requisites for socialism which it inherited from capitalism, and then, starting from a new, a socialist basis, created by the proletarian dictatorship, overtake and outstrip the "advanced" capitalist countries.

Thus, the ideas developed by Lenin in the present article are linked up with his doctrine that imperialism is the eve of socialism and with his general theory of the proletarian revolution.

What Lenin says in this article regarding the possibility of creating the necessary "cultural" requisites for socialism in Russia, where capitalism had not yet sufficiently created these cultural requisites before the proletarian revolution, is but one expression of his general doctrine of the proletarian revolution. At the same time, these ideas are directly connected with another so insistently emphasised by Lenin, namely, that in Russia under the dictatorship of the proletariat "everything necessary" for the building of socialism already exists, and that therefore socialism can be built up in the Soviet Union as a single country, provided it pursues a correct policy, particularly in relation to the peasant masses. At the Eleventh Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, held a year before the article "Our Revolution" was written, Lenin said:

"The economic forces possessed by the proletarian state of Russia are entirely sufficient to secure the transition to communism. What, then, is lacking? It is obvious what is lacking. What is lacking is a proper degree of culture of that section of the Communists who are managing affairs."

The culture of the section of the Communists who are managing affairs and the culture of the masses are indissolubly associated. Hence, when Lenin in 1923, in his article "On Co-operation," returns to the subject that everything necessary exists in Russia for the upbuilding of socialism in the sense of the "economic forces possessed by the proletarian state" for effecting the socialist transformation of the countryside, he speaks of the necessity for a "cultural revolution." That cultural revolution is now being carried out by the Bolshevik Party and the Soviet government, and is being accompanied by the "eradication of the roots of capitalism," the collectivisation of agriculture, and, on that basis, the liquidation of the kulaks.

PAGE 509. The reference is to the following passage from a letter written by Marx to Engels on April 16, 1856:

"The whole thing in Germany will depend on the possibility to back the proletarian revolution by some second edition of the Peasants' War. Then the affair will be splendid."

